

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LIBRARY

Collection.
rd in 1893.

Poste

253

9

1 20

ILLUSTRATIONS

OF THE

HISTORY OF MEDIEVAL THOUGHT

ILLUSTRATIONS

OF THE

HISTORY OF MEDIEVAL THOUGHT

SI VIS URANIAS SURSUM VOLITARE PER AURAS, OMMATE GLAUCIVIDO LUSTRABIS TEMPLA SOPHYAE.

Ioannes Scotus.

ILLUSTRATIONS
OF THE
HISTORY OF MEDIEVAL THOUGHT

IN THE DEPARTMENTS OF THEOLOGY AND ECCLESIASTICAL POLITICS

BY REGINALD LANE POOLE, M.A.

BALLIOL COLLEGE, OXFORD
DOCTOR IN PHILOSOPHY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LEIPZIG

PUBLISHED FOR THE HIBBERT TRUSTEES

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE
14 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON
AND 20 SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH

MDCCCLXXXIV

[All rights reserved]

Oxford

PRINTED BY HORACE HART, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

1994
 1995
 1996
 1997
 1998
 1999 2000
 2001
 2002
 2003
 2004
 2005
 2006
 2007
 2008
 2009 2010
 2011
 2012
 2013
 2014
 2015 2016
 2017
 2018
 2019 2020
 2021
 2022
 2023
 2024 2025
 2026 2027
 2028
 2029
 2030
 2031
 2032
 2033
 2034
 2035
 2036
 2037
 2038
 2039
 2040 2041
 2042
 2043
 2044
 2045
 2046
 2047
 2048
 2049
 2050
 2051
 2052
 2053
 2054
 2055
 2056
 2057
 2058
 2059
 2060 2061
 2062
 2063
 2064
 2065
 2066 2067
 2068
 2069
 2070
 2071
 2072 2073
 2074
 2075
 2076
 2077
 2078
 2079
 2080 2081
 2082
 2083
 2084
 2085 2086
 2087
 2088
 2089
 2090
 2091
 2092
 2093
 2094
 2095
 2096 2097
 2098
 2099
 2100
 2101
 2102 2103
 2104
 2105 2106
 2107
 2108
 2109
 2110
 2111
 2112
 2113
 2114
 2115 2116
 2117
 2118
 2119
 2120
 2121
 2122
 2123
 2124
 2125
 2126
 2127
 2128
 2129 2130
 2131
 2132
 2133
 2134
 2135
 2136
 2137
 2138
 2139
 2140
 2141
 2142
 2143
 2144
 2145
 2146
 2147 2148
 2149
 2150
 2151
 2152
 2153
 2154
 2155
 2156
 2157
 2158
 2159
 2160
 2161
 2162
 2163
 2164
 2165
 2166 2167
 2168
 2169
 2170
 2171
 2172
 2173
 2174
 2175
 2176
 2177
 2178
 2179
 2180
 2181
 2182
 2183
 2184
 2185
 2186
 2187
 2188
 2189
 2190
 2191
 2192
 2193
 2194
 2195
 2196
 2197
 2198
 2199
 2200
 2201
 2202 2203
 2204
 2205
 2206
 2207
 2208 2209
 2210
 2211 2212
 2213
 2214
 2215
 2216
 2217 2218
 2219
 2220
 2221
 2222
 2223
 2224
 2225
 2226
 2227
 2228
 2229
 2230
 2231
 2232
 2233
 2234
 2235
 2236
 2237
 2238
 2239
 2240
 2241
 2242
 2243
 2244
 2245
 2246
 2247
 2248
 2249
 2250
 2251
 2252
 2253
 2254
 2255
 2256
 2257
 2258
 2259
 2260
 2261
 2262 2263
 2264 2265
 2266
 2267
 2268
 2269
 2270
 2271
 2272
 2273
 2274 2275
 2276
 2277 2278
 2279 2280
 2281
 2282
 2283
 2284
 2285
 2286
 2287
 2288
 2289
 2290
 2291
 2292
 2293
 2294
 2295 2296
 2297
 2298
 2299
 2300 2301
 2302
 2303
 2304
 2305
 2306
 2307 2308
 2309
 2310
 2311
 2312 2313
 2314
 2315 2316
 2317
 2318
 2319 2320 2321
 2322
 2323 2324
 2325
 2326
 2327
 2328
 2329
 2330
 2331
 2332
 2333
 2334
 2335
 2336
 2337
 2338
 2339 2340 2341
 2342
 2343
 2344 2345
 2346 2347
 2348
 2349 2350 2351 2352
 2353
 2354
 2355
 2356
 2357
 2358 2359
 2360 2361 2362
 2363
 2364
 2365
 2366 2367
 2368 2369
 2370 2371
 2372
 2373
 2374
 2375
 2376
 2377
 2378
 2379
 2380
 2381 2382
 2383
 2384
 2385 2386
 2387
 2388
 2389
 2390 2391
 2392
 2393 2394
 2395
 2396
 2397
 2398
 2399
 2400
 2401
 2402
 2403
 2404 2405
 2406
 2407 2408 2409
 2410
 2411
 2412
 2413
 2414
 2415
 2416
 2417
 2418 2419 2420
 2421
 2422
 2423
 2424 2425
 2426
 2427
 2428
 2429 2430
 2431
 2432
 2433
 2434 2435 2436
 2437
 2438 2439 2440
 2441
 2442

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following series of essays was mainly written during two years of residence in Germany and Switzerland, in accordance with the rules of the Hibbert trustees, at whose gift the author held a travelling scholarship, and by whose direction the present volume is now published.

OXFORD, September 11, 1884.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	I
CHAPTER I.
CLAUDIUS OF TURIN AND AGOBARD OF LYONS	27
CHAPTER II.
JOHN THE SCOT	53
CHAPTER III.
THE DARK AGE	79
CHAPTER IV.
THE SCHOOL OF CHARTRES	109
CHAPTER V.
✓ PETER ABAILLARD	136
CHAPTER VI.
THE TRIAL OF GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE	167
CHAPTER VII.
✓ JOHN OF SALISBURY	201
CHAPTER VIII.
THE HIERARCHICAL DOCTRINE OF THE STATE	226
CHAPTER IX.
THE OPPOSITION TO THE TEMPORAL CLAIMS OF THE PAPACY	256
CHAPTER X.
WYCLIFFE'S DOCTRINE OF LORDSHIP	282

APPENDIX.

	PAGE
I. NOTE ON JOHN THE SCOT'S SUPPOSED TRAVELS IN GREECE	311
II. EXCURSUS ON THE LATER HISTORY OF JOHN THE SCOT	313
III. NOTE ON A SUPPOSED THEOLOGICAL EXPOSITION BY GILBERT	329
IV. NOTE ON THE PRECURSORS OF NOMINALISM	330
V. EXCURSUS ON A SUPPOSED ANTICIPATION OF SAINT ANSELM	338
VI. EXCURSUS ON THE WRITINGS OF WILLIAM OF CONCHES	340
VII. EXCURSUS ON THE INTERPRETATION OF A PLACE IN JOHN OF SALISBURY'S METALOGICUS	359
VIII. NOTE ON ABAILARD'S MASTERS	363
IX. NOTE ON THE SECOND PREFACE TO GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE'S COMMENTARY ON BOETHIUS	367
X. NOTE ON CLARENBALD OF ARRAS	370
INDEX OF NAMES	373

QUOTATIONS from the Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France are given simply as Bouquet: references to Pertz are to the series of Scriptores in the Monumenta Germaniae Historica, and those to Jaffé are to the Bibliotheca Rerum Germanicarum, unless otherwise stated. For the Policraticus and Metalogicus of John of Salisbury the author has used indifferently the small edition of Jo. Maire as issued at Leyden in 1639 and at Amsterdam in 1664. With respect to the details of punctuation and the employment of capital and italic letters, he has not kept strictly to the practice of the various works quoted. In references to manuscripts b appended to a numeral indicates the verso of the leaf; when however a manuscript is written in double columns, A, B, and C, D, denote respectively the two columns of recto and verso.

INTRODUCTION.

THE history of medieval thought falls naturally into two broad divisions, each of which is brought to a close not by the creation of a new method or system from native resources, but by the introduction of fresh materials for study from without. The first period ended when the works of Aristotle, hitherto known only from partial and scanty versions, were translated into Latin; the second, when a knowledge of Greek letters in their own language made it impossible for men to remain satisfied with the views of ancient philosophy to which they had previously been confined and upon which their own philosophy had entirely depended. An age of eclecticism, too eager in its enjoyment of the new-found treasure to care to bind itself, as its predecessors had done, to any single authority, was then followed by an age in which the interests of theological controversy drove out every other interest, until at length in the comparative calm after the tempest of the reformation, philosophy entered a new phase, and the medieval or traditional method was finally rejected in favour of one common in this respect to both modern and ancient speculation, that it rested upon independent thought, and regarded no authority as beyond appeal.

In the two periods of the middle ages we find nothing absolutely original ; advance is measured less by the power with which men used their intellects than by the skill with which they used their materials. Still there is a difference between the periods which makes the earlier the more interesting to the student of human thought considered as apart from any specific production of it: for while the works of Aristotle were almost totally unknown to the Latin world there was a wider sphere for the exercise of ingenuity, for something approaching originality, than there could be when an authoritative text-book lay ready to hand. In the following essay our attention will be mainly directed to these traces of independence, not so much in the domain of formal philosophy as in those regions where philosophy touches religion, where reason meets superstition, and where theology links itself with political theory. In the later period we shall limit ourselves exclusively to this last subject, to the attempts made to frame a political philosophy, and in particular to reconcile the notion of the state with the existence and the claims of an universal church, or to modify those claims by reference to the necessary exigencies of civil government.

INTRODUC-
TION.
—

The field therefore of our investigation is that of theology, but it does not follow on this account that its produce must also be theological. Theology is no doubt the mode of medieval thought: the history of the middle ages is the history of the Latin church. The overmastering strength of theology, of a clergy which as a rule absorbed all the functions of a literary class, gave its shape to every thing with which it came into contact. Society was treated as though it were actually a theocracy: politics, philosophy, education, were brought under its control and adjusted to a technical theological terminology. But when this characteristic is recognised, it is found to supply not only the explanation of the distance which seems to separate the middle ages from modern times, but also a means of bridging over the interval. Men thought theologically and expressed themselves theologically, but when we penetrate this formal expression we discover their speculations, their aims, their hopes, to be at bottom not very different from our own ; we discover a variety beneath the monotonous surface of their thoughts, and at the same time an unity, ill-defined perhaps, but still an unity, pervading the history of European society. There was indeed never a time when the life of Christendom was so confined within the hard shell of its dogmatic system that there was no room left for individual liberty of opinion. A ferment of thought is continually betrayed beneath those forms ; there are even frequent indications of a state of opinion antagonistic to the church itself. The necessity of a central power ruling the consciences of men of course passed unquestioned, but when this immense authority appeared not a protection but a menace to religion, it was seldom that it was submitted to in complete silence. When the church seemed to be departing from its spiritual dignity and defiling its ceremonial by the superstitions and the prodigies of heathenism, or when its pontiffs seemed to have adopted all the vices of secular princes and to have exchanged totally the church for the world, there were rarely wanting advocates of a purer Christian order, advocates whose denunciations might rival in vehemence those of a modern protestant. Even the doctrinal fabric of the church was not always safe from attack ; for although no one impugned the truth of Christianity, the attempt was still repeatedly made to clear away the dust of centuries and reveal the simpler system of primitive belief. Such efforts, until we ap-

INTRODUC-
TION.
—

INTRODUC-
TION.
—

proach the border-line of modern history were invariably disappointed. They rarely exerted even a momentary influence over a wide circle. In truth, however generously conceived, however heroically sustained, the aims of the premature reformers were often too audaciously, too wantonly, directed against the beliefs of the mass of their fellow-Christians to deserve success. We may admire their nobility or their constancy, but an impartial judgement can hardly regret that they failed. They troubled the world, it might be for a few years, and left their single memorial in their writings. Yet, though they may occupy but a small place in the history of civilisation, the light they cast upon the unusual tendencies of thought, the eccentricities, of the middle ages, makes them a not unfruitful subject for study.

A still more suggestive line of enquiry is opened in the general history of thought and learning. The masculine spirit and the confidence with which the philosophers of the period carried on their speculations is hardly suspected by those who are not familiar with the original literature. Men who were least of all inclined to oppose anything that bore the stamp of traditional authority, displayed a freedom of judgement which could not but tend to consequences in one way or another divergent from the established system. The methods by which they accommodated the two are indeed evidence of the imperfect grasp they possessed of the inexorable demands of the reasoning faculties : their theological consciences were equally inexorable in requiring the adjustment ; or perhaps more truly, the necessary conformity of reason and authority was so regularly assumed that they were unaware of the act of accommodation ; the theological correctness of the conclusion, however arrived at, was the inevitable consequence of this implicit identification of contradictory terms in the premises. We are often at liberty to leave the ultimate reconciliation out of account, as a mode characteristic of the time rather than an argument due to the individual writer. It is the road on which their thoughts travel that retains its interest for the student of philosophical history.

The continuous activity of the human reason in Latin Christendom has its witness partly in the opposition, conscious or unconscious, to the tradition of the church, partly in the spirit of its philosophy. Through these currents we may learn the deeper springs which existed in men's minds and which, however often dormant, frozen by the rigid strength of theology, were yet capable of welling forth to nourish the world. The position held by intellectual studies and by learned men is uniformly the measure of the prevalence of these liberal forces in society; yet since the greatest writers have usually exercised a more powerful influence over posterity than over their own generation, it is chiefly from their works that we can estimate the power which the stimulus once given to learning and thought could gain in a few minds outstripping their fellows. The history of learning therefore not only supplies the links that connect the several divisions of the first part of our enquiry, but also the groundwork on which its argument must be constructed.

It is well known that the rise of the western church was accompanied by a rapid decline in the study of classical letters¹. Learning, such as it was, became restricted to one class, the clergy or the monks, and these became more and more inclined to elevate their professional study at the expense, or to the condemnation, of every other. The rhetorical schools which had kept alive, however poorly, the tradition of classical learning were suffered themselves to die out, and their place was only in a small part taken by the seminaries which gradually grew up about different cathedral or monastic establishments. The grammarian was expelled by the scholastic, and the scholastic had little interest or little power to imbue his disciples with more knowledge than was required for a perfunctory execution of the offices of the church. Those who aspired to lead others would seek to advance to an acquaintance, seldom profound or extensive, with the writings of the fathers; and might thus obtain an indirect and distant view of that country from which Augustin and even Jerom had not been able, however desirous, to shake themselves free. But since the day when the expiring paganism of Rome had entered its last conflict with Christianity, the church had granted no terms to the system she had displaced. It was not alone that the philosophical spirit had proved inimical to orthodoxy: Tertullian's famous saying, Haereticorum patriarchae philosophi, expresses but a portion of the truth. The entire classical tradition, all learning in its large sense, was treated not merely as irrelevant to the studies of the Christian, but as a snare from which he was taught to flee as from a temptation of the evil one. Such an antagonism inevitably tended to limit

¹ In preparing the following section for the press I have derived much help from the first chapters of M. Hauréau's Histoire de la Phi-

INTRODUCTION.

* Adv. Hermog. viii, opp. 295 a, ed. 1617 Cologne folio.

losophie scolastique, 1872, and of Mr. John Bass Mullinger's essay on The Schools of Charles the Great; 1877. I am also indebted to A. F. Ozanam's Civilisation chrétienne chez les Francs, ch. ix, 3rd ed.,

1861 (being the fourth volume of his Oeuvres). There are some interesting remarks on the attitude of the church towards secular learning in S. R. Maitland's Dark Ages, xi pp. 171-187 (cf. p. 403 n. 2); 1844.

the aims and to narrow the character of the Christian church. It is not necessary here to trace its immediate result upon her doctrine and ceremonial; the fact by itself suffices to shew that as Christianity extended its sway among the nations that had overwhelmed the empire, it could not bring with it those refining influences by which it would have been attended, had it absorbed and purified the culture of Rome. As it was, the church was built upon the ruins of a subjugated society; its fabric was but a step less barbarous than that of the Teutonic civilisation by which it was confronted.

INTRODUC-
TION.

Confining our view to the literary aspect of the question, the marks of retrogression are clear and unmistakeable. Among the few who still cultivated learning oratory degenerated into panegyric, poetry occupied itself almost exclusively with mean or trivial subjects. With the rest the Latin language itself lost its nerve; idiom and even syntax were forgotten: it was enough if a writer could make himself understood at all. If up to the fifth century we find rare examples of an opposite tendency, the hostility of the church towards letters is thenceforth nearly universal. In the sixth century indeed Cassiodorus labours to prove that secular learning is good and profitable, utilis et non refugienda cognitio, and anxiously supports his argument by a catalogue of learned men from Moses to the fathers downwards²: but the apology itself implies the discredit into which learning had fallen. A little later that discredit was completed when Gregory the Great † 604.

* De institutione divinarum literarum, xxvii, xxviii; Opp. 2. 523 sq., ed. J. Garet. Venice 1729 folio. Quis enim, he concludes, audeat habere dubium, ubi virorum talium multiplex præcedit exemplum? scientes plane... rectam veramque scientiam dominum posse concedere.

INTRODUC-
TION.

^b Policrat.
viii 19 p.
646: cf. lib.
ii. 26 p. 123.

^c Ep. ix. 54;
opp. 2. 1139 F,
ed. Bened., Paris 1705
folio.

employed his unrivalled authority to denounce all secular learning. The common story that the pope burned the Palatine library, because, as ^b John of Salisbury hints, he had a greater interest in the holy Scriptures, is no doubt false; but it not inaccurately represents the attitude Gregory took up in regard to classical studies. The letter which he wrote on the subject to Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, has been often quoted, but it is too characteristic to be omitted here. The bishop, it seems, had ventured to teach grammar and read the poets. Gregory's remonstrance is as follows: *A report has reached us which we cannot mention without a blush, that thou expoudest grammar to certain friends; whereat we are so offended and filled with scorn that our former opinion of thee is turned to mourning and sorrow. The same mouth singeth not the praises of Jove and the praises of Christ³. Think how grievous and unspeakable a thing it is for a bishop to utter that which becometh not even a religious layman. . . . If hereafter it be clearly established that the rumour which we have heard is false and that thou art not applying thyself to the idle vanities of secular learning—nugis et secularibus litteris, a significant hendiadys,—we shall render thanks to our God who hath not delivered over thy heart to be defiled by the blasphemous praises of unspeakable men⁴.*

³ The words, 'In uno se ore Iovis laudibus Christi laudes non capiunt,' have been misunderstood: see Mullinger, p. 77. I have no doubt that the phrase is borrowed from saint Jerom, 'Absit ut de ora Christiana sonet Iupiter omnipotens,' &c.: Ep. ad Damas., Opp. 4 (1) 153, ed. Bened., Paris 1706 folio.

⁴ M Hauréau, i. 5, wittily compares the language of Jack Cade to lord Say: 'Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar-school: and

whereas before our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used; and contrary to the king, his crown and dignity, thou hast built a paper-mill. It will be proved to thy face that thou hast men about thee that usually talk of a noun, and a verb, and such abominable words as no Christian ear can endure to hear.' 2 King Henry VI. iv. 7. 'On le voit, l'imagination du poëte n'a pu rien ajouter au texte de la lettre ponti-

This then was the policy, if we may so call it, of the church with regard to education, declared by him who has an undisputed title to be called 'the father of the medieval papacy, and whose example was law to his successors, as indeed it was to the whole of Latin Christendom for many ages. From this authority there was however one corner of Europe practically exempted⁵. Ireland had as yet remained free from the invasion of foreign barbarians, and had held its own tradition not only of Christian but also of classical culture. Although it did not receive Christianity until the middle of the fifth century⁶, the newly-planted religion had grown up with astonishing rapidity and strength⁷. The Irish, or, to give them their proper name, the Scots, had no sooner been enlightened by the preaching of the Gaul, saint Patrick, than they pressed forward to make all nations participators in the knowledge of their new faith. Already there was a steady emigration across the north channel into that country which was soon to borrow the civilisation, the very name, of the settlers⁸. Now, that

INTRODUC-
TION.

⁴ Milman,
hist. of Lat.
Christ. 2. 102, 3rd ed. 1872.

ficale.' Unspeakable, 'nefandus,' we may notice was a favourite word with Gregory, to whom the Lombard for instance was regularly nefandissimus.

⁵ M Hauréau's chapter on the Écoles d'Irlande, in his Singularités historiques et littéraires, 1861, is full of the sort of interest which that author is peculiarly skilful in giving to whatever he writes. The most complete, though brief, survey of the Irish missions with which I am acquainted, is contained in an extremely learned essay by Arthur West Haddan on Scots on the Continent, printed in his Remains, 258-294, Oxford 1876. Finally, the character of the ancient Irish and their church is well sketched in John Richard Green's Making of England, 277-289; 1881: the materials for the last-named subject are to be found to a great extent in the introduction to J. H. Todd's Saint Patrick the Apostle of Ireland, Dublin 1864.

⁶ That there might have been and probably were a few Christians in Ireland before saint Patrick's day is not of course denied: for the facts see Todd 197.

⁷ 'It is recorded by chroniclers, as one might chronicle a good harvest, that A.D. 674 Ireland was full of saints:' Haddan 264.

⁸ For a long time the name of Scotland continued to be common to the two countries. Thus saint Notker Balbulus speaks of an event as occurring in Scotia, insula Hybernia: Martyrolog. ad v. Id. Iun.,

INTRODUC-
TION.
—

emigration took a distinctively religious character. The little island of Hy off the coast of Mull became the head-spring from which Christianity was to penetrate among the rude inhabitants of the Pictish highlands, or the English of Northumbria or Mercia. But the zeal of the Irish missionaries could not be confined within the compass of Britain. The Celt yielded not to the Northman in his passion for travel⁹; then as now the poverty of the land was the peremptory cause of emigration: but the ambition of the missionary supplied a far stronger incentive to distant enterprises than the mere love of adventure or the mere hope of gain; and those who had once been known but as the pirates whose terrible fleets ravaged the coasts of Britain or Gaul, became the peaceful colonists of Christianity in nearly every land where the Teuton in his advance westward had established himself. From Iceland to the Danube or the Apennines, among Frank or Burgundian or Lombard, the Irish energy seemed omnipotent and inexhaustible.

To account in any sort for this astonishing activity we have to go back to the form in which the Celtic church had grown up, and observe how its loose and irregular organisation left its ministers free to choose their own work where they would. In other countries the diocese had been the basis of Christian organisation: in Ireland it was the monastery. This was the centre of the religious community; the abbat, not the bishop, was its representative chief. When gifts were made to the in J. Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. eccles. et hist. 2 (3) 140, Antwerp 1725 folio. Compare the evidence collected by archbishop Usher, Britann. Ecclesiarum Antiquit. 380-

384, ed. 2. London 1687 folio.

⁹ Scotorum, quibus consuetudo peregrinandi iam paene in naturam conversa est: Vit. s. Gall. ii. 47 in Pertz 2. 30; 1829.

church the monastery was the recipient; the abbat was their steward. Round the monastery then the provincial clergy grouped themselves as a tribe or clan. The absence of any fixed endowment was an insuperable obstacle to the formation of an ecclesiastical constitution after the common pattern. Almost everywhere the bishops were untrammelled by the cares of a definite diocese; often a band of many bishops is found settled at one place. The lesser clergy were driven to earn a living as they might, in the secular business of the farm or the plough. They had no hopes of ecclesiastical preferment to tempt them to stay at home: poverty was their natural lot, and it might be met with as little inconvenience abroad. Thus they poured forth upon the continent, the most devoted, the least self-seeking of missionaries: how poor they were we may learn from the fact that special hostelries were founded for their reception in many places of the Frankish realm by the charity of their wealthier fellow-countrymen¹⁰.

INTRODUC-
TION.

* See Todd
1-7, 27, &c.

It is not however with the religious work of the Scots that we are immediately concerned: their literary tradition is still more remarkable and characteristic. Isolated in a remote island, the stream of classical learning had remained pure while the rest of Roman Europe had suffered it to be corrupted or dried up in the weary decay of the empire that followed the German influx. In Ireland it was still fresh and buoyant; and from the Irish it passed back to the continent in greater and greater waves.

¹⁰ At least these 'hospitalia Scottorum quae sancti homines gentis illius in hoc regno construxerunt et rebus pro sanctitate sua acquisitis ampliaverunt' were sufficiently numerous for the abuses by which the foundations had been diverted from their proper purpose, to call for the attention of the council of Meaux in 845, can. xl.: Mansi, Conciliorum amplissima Collectio 14. 827 sq., Venice 1769 folio. The ordinance for their reform was sanctioned by a capitulary of Charles the Bald a year later: Pertz, Leg. 1. 390 sq.; 1835.

INTRODUC-
TION.

^f Hist. eccl.
iii. 27 p. 203,
ed. G. H.
Moberly, Oxford 1869.

^g Cf. Haddan
271 sqq.

^h Cf. Ozanam
480-486.

ⁱ James iii. 15.

Of the means by which their education was acquired at home we are but scantily informed. In the seventh century, ^f Bede tells us, the Northumbrian nobles, and others too of middle rank, flocked to the schools of Ireland; and 'while some faithfully dedicated themselves to the monastic life, others chose rather to pass in turn through the cells of the masters and give their labour to study: and the Scots most readily received them, and provided them daily their food without charge, and books also to read, and free instruction.' But we have to guess from a variety of scattered notices and suggestions the precise way in which the Irish tradition of learning differed from that current upon the continent. At one moment we read of saint Camin, a teacher on an island of Loughderg, who made a critical edition of the Psalms with a collation of the Hebrew text¹¹; and there is at all events ^g evidence to shew that the Scots possessed, in common with the Britons, a Latin version of the Bible distinct from the vulgate. It is certain too that the ^h Greek language which had practically ceased to be known elsewhere in the west, was widely cultivated in the schools of Ireland. But what is of greater significance is the fact that there reigned, not only among her professed scholars but also among the plain missionaries whom she sent forth to preach the gospel to the heathen, a classical spirit, a love of literature for its own sake, a keen delight in poetry. The very field of study of which the Latin was taught to say, ⁱ This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish, was that to

¹¹ On this abbat Camin of Iniskeltra who died in 653 see J. Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland 3. 11, 2nd ed., Dublin 1829. Usher says, Antiq. 503, that he saw a portion of the saint's work,

said to be autograph. It was elaborately noted with the usual critical signs, and contained on the upper part of the page a collation with the Hebrew, and brief scholia in the outer margin.

which the Scot turned with the purest enthusiasm. The gaiety of the Celtic nature made him shew his devotion to the classical poets by imitating them. Saint Columban, the apostle of Burgundy, whom men knew as the stern preacher of an austere creed¹², as the haughty rebuker of kings, was wont to seek refreshment from his religious labours in sending his friends *letters in verse, now in the rimed couplets of his own day, now in hexameters. Sometimes ¹the initials of the lines spell an acrostich: once the saint writes a long letter composed of a string of adonics¹³. Meagre as his performances may appear, if judged by ancient models, Columban's more serious poems are neither awkward nor ungraceful. All of them are full of conceits and mythological allusions; they read as the work of an entire pagan¹⁴. Equally they prove the

INTRODUC-TION. —* Usher,
vet. epist.
Hibern. sylloge, 9-18.
Dublin 1632
quarto.
¹ pp. 10 sq.

¹² The severity of the Rule put forth by Columban, in comparison with that of saint Benedict, is admitted, though Milman, 2. 294, seems to imply an opposite judgement. Haddan, indeed, p. 267, goes so far as to claim an Irish origin for the substance of the entire penitential system. Compare William Bright, Chapters of early English Church History 96, Oxford 1878.

¹³ Accipe, quaeso,
nunc bipedali condita versu carminulorum munera parva.

Afterwards he excuses the eccentricity of his metre:

sufficit autem
ista loquaci nunc cecinisse carmina versu.
Nam nova forsân esse videtur ista legenti formula versus.
Sed tamen illa Troigenarum

inclita vates nomine Sappho versibus istis dulce solebat edere carmen.

Then he explains the construction of the verse and concludes with a second apology, this time in hexameters, urging the weariness of old age and feeble health as a justification of his license: Usher 13-18.

¹⁴ M. Hauréau, Singularités 12 sqq., rightly dwells on this characteristic. I have not noticed the poem ascribed to saint Livinus, whom tradition makes the apostle of Brabant in the seventh century; because the likelihood is that these elegiacs (printed in Usher 19 sqq.) are as spurious as the biography, called saint Boniface's, with which they appear to stand plainly connected. The poetry of the Scots is however far from being limited to these two examples: Usher prints another piece, pp. 36 sq.; and in later times instances, as that of John Scot, are not uncommon.

INTRODUCTION.

^m Cf. Green, mak. of Engl. 286 sq.

breadth and freedom of the training which he had received at Banchor and which was the peculiar possession of the Scots. There is a ^m vein of poetry running through the whole lives of these Irish confessors, a poetry of which the stories of their acts are indeed better witnesses than their practical essays in verse-making. They brought imagination, as they brought spiritual force, into a world well-nigh sunk in materialism.

Their lighter productions shew one side of the Scottish nature: their earnest, single-hearted pursuit of learning in the widest sense attainable, their solid hard work as scholars, is not less characteristic. Ireland was once the university, the ⁿ literary market not only, as we have seen, of northern England, but also ^o of the Frankish realm; and if its progress at home was arrested after the fatal inroad of the Norsemen in 795¹⁵, the seed which the Scots had sown in other lands grew to a nobler maturity than it had ever reached on its own soil.

ⁿ Cf. Camden, Britann. 730, ed. Lond. 1607 folio.

^o Aldhelm, ep. iii, Migne 80, 94 C, D; 1863: cf. Ozanam 487.

^p Cf. Haddan 267.

Wherever they went they founded schools. Malmesbury, the house of which saint Ealdhelm was a scholar and ultimately abbat, took its origin from the company of disciples that gathered about a poor Scottish teacher, ^q Mailduf, as he sat in his hut beside the walls of the old castle of Ingelborne. The foundations of saint Colum-

^q W. Malmeſb. gest. pontif. v. pp. 333 sq., ed. N. E. S. A. Hamilton, 1870, Rolls series. Cf. Bright 259; H. Hahn, Bonifaz und Lul 8 sq.; 1883.

¹⁵ For the date see Todd, intr. to The War of the Gaedhil with the Gaill, pp. xxxii-xxxiv; 1867, Rolls series. The earlier invasion by the Northumbrian Egfrith (Bed. iv. 26 p. 275) was little more than a momentary raid: the vikings on the contrary settled in Ireland, plundered the churches, and destroyed all the special tokens of Irish civilisation; see Green, Conquest of England, 65 sq.; 1883. From a poem describing how Sulgen, afterwards bishop of Saint David's ivit ad Hibernos sophia mirabile claros, written by the bishop's son John, Usher, in his preface to the Sylogae, infers that there was a revival of the Irish schools after the Danish invasion; since the verse relates to about the middle of the eleventh century: but of this further proof is wanting.

ban, Luxeuil, and Bobbio¹⁶, long remained centres of learned activity amid Burgundian or Lombard barbarism; the settlement of his comrade, saint Gall, rose into the proud abbey which yet retains his name, and which was for centuries the beacon-tower of learning in western Europe; the sister-abbey of Reichenau, its rival both in power and in cultivation, also owed probably its establishment on its island in the lake of Constance to the teaching of a Scot. Under the shelter of these great houses, and of such as these, learning was planted in a multitude of lesser societies scattered over the tracts of German colonisation; and almost uniformly the impulse which led to their formation as schools as well as monasteries, if not their actual foundation, is directly due to the energetic devotion of the Scottish travellers.

A new epoch in their labours abroad is opened in the empire of Charles the Great, whose hearty goodwill towards scholars and whose zeal for the promotion of learning are as characteristic and well-known as his skill as a soldier or as a king. If his reign marks the dividing line between ancient and medieval history, it is not only by virtue of its political facts but also because it begins the age of the education of the northern races, fitting them in time to rule the world as the Romans had done before them. In this great work the Scots, instead of toiling humbly by themselves, were now welcomed and recognised as indispensable coöperators. Their entry into the Frankish realm is related in the Acts of Charles the Great, written by a monk of Saint Gall towards the end of the ninth century, whose account, however much ¹⁶ On their foundation see Bede's 3. 283, 304 sq., ed. Basle 1563 life of Columban, x and xxix, Opp.

INTRODUC-
TION.

—
* Cf. Haddan
281.

coloured by legendary ornaments, may still 'not unreasonably be held to contain a certain groundwork of fact; at the least it points rightly to the main source from which the impulse of learning was communicated afresh to the continent.

* Gest. Kar. magn. i. i
Pertz 2. 731.

When, says the monk, the illustrious Charles had begun to reign alone in the western parts of the world and the study of letters was everywhere well-nigh forgotten, in such sort that the worship of the true God declined, it chanced that two Scots from Ireland lighted with the British merchants on the coast of Gaul, men learned without compare as well in secular as in sacred writings; who, since they shewed nothing for sale, kept crying to the crowd that gathered to buy, If any man is desirous of wisdom, let him come to us and receive it; for we have it to sell. This therefore they declared they had for sale, since they saw the people to traffic not in gifts but in saleable things, so that they thus might either urge them to purchase wisdom like other goods or, as the events following shew, turn them by such declaration to wonder and astonishment. At length their cry being long continued was brought by certain that wondered at them or deemed them mad, to the ears of Charles the king, always a lover and most desirous of wisdom: who, when he had called them with all haste into his presence, enquired if, as he understood by report, they had wisdom verily with them. Yea, said they, we have it and are ready to impart to any that rightly seek it in the name of the Lord. When therefore he had enquired what they would have in return for it, they answered, Only proper places and noble souls, and such things as we cannot travel without, food and wherewith to clothe ourselves. Hearing this he was filled with great joy, and first for a short space entertained them both in his household; afterwards when he was constrained to warlike enterprises, he enjoined the one, by name Clement, to abide in

Gaul; to whom he entrusted boys of the most noble, middle, and lowest ranks, in goodly number, and ordained that victual should be provided them according as they had need, with fitting houses to dwell in. The other¹⁷ he despatched into Italy and appointed him the monastery of Saint Austin beside the Ticinian city, that there such as were willing to learn might gather together unto him.

Now, adds the biographer, a certain Albinus, the name is an accepted classical adaptation of Alcuin, by race an Englishman, when he heard that the most religious emperor Charles was glad to welcome learned men, he too entered into a ship and came to him. Here we are no doubt still wider of historical accuracy: it was not in this manner that Alcuin made acquaintance with the Frankish king, nor is it probable that the arrival of the Irish scholars was attended by the picturesque circumstances which the monk relates. Yet however little there be of truth in the fable, it is still valuable as evidence of the clearness with which a subsequent generation seized the main fact of Charles's indebtedness to the British islands, and also with which it expressed, as an accepted and natural relation, the notion of affinity between learning and godliness which it was the work of Alcuin and still

INTRODUC-
TION.

^t Cf. Mullinger 69.

¹⁷ 'Alterum vero nomine:' two manuscripts add the name 'Albinum'; the rest of those collated by Pertz leave a blank space after 'nomine,' while the copies from which Jaffé prints, Biblioth. Rer. Germ. 4. 632, 1867, omit 'nomine' as well. I incline to think that 'Albinum' stood in the original text, and was excluded because the sequel showed that the person intended could not be the same with the well-known Alcuin, while no contemporary scholar of the name was known. It may be observed that the 'Albinum' does not appear in the quotation of the passage given by Vincent of Beauvais, Speculum historiale, xxiv. 173, Nuremberg 1483 folio. I notice this because M Hauréau, De la Philosophie scholastique, i. 14, 1850 (the passage seems to have been omitted in the new edition of the book,—the Histoire), states the contrary. The legend therefore says nothing of the English Alcuin, certainly nothing of John the Scot, ornaments added by later writers, which even M Hauréau, in his earlier work, confounded with the original story.

INTRODUC-
TION.

^a Encycl. de litt. colend.,
Pertz. legg.
1. 52 sq.; cf.
Mullinger
97 sqq., 102.

² Vit. Car.
xxi. Jaffé 4.
528.

more of the Scots to inculcate upon their age. Through their influence it was that the king sent forth the famous capitularies of 787 and the following years, which enforced the establishment of schools in connexion with every abbey in his realm, and laid the foundation of medieval learning¹⁸. Amabat peregrinos is said almost to Charles's reproach by his biographer ²Einhard; yet the strangers whom he welcomed are in truth the first authors of the restoration of letters in Francia.

The name of Alcuin introduces us to another element in this work. For if Ireland stood alone in its freedom from the intellectually depressing tradition of the Roman church, England had also been for some time the scene of a literary life, less independent indeed and more correct in its ecclesiastical spirit, but hardly less broad than that of the Scots. A singular fortune had brought together as the second fathers of the English church, ²a Greek of Tarsus and an African, Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, and Hadrian, abbat of Saint Peter's in that city, the one from Rome, the other from the neighbourhood of Naples. While Theodore worked to reduce the church of England into a nearer conformity with catholic discipline, the two friends had their school at Canterbury, where one might ²learn not only the knowledge which made a good churchman, but also astronomy and the art of writing verses, and apparently even medicine. But the previous experience of the teachers enabled them to extend their lessons into a field still less

A. D. 668-9.

² Bed. iv. 1
p. 212; cf.
Bright, chapters 219 sqq.

^a Bed. iv. 2
pp. 214 sq.;
Bright
237 sq.

¹⁸ A variety of notices respecting the schools of the time is collected by the Benedictines in the Histoire littéraire de la France, 4. 12 sqq.; 1738 quarto. They concern chiefly Lyons, Orleans, Fulda, Corbie, Fontenelle, Saint Denys, and Tours.

It was to Tours that Alcuin withdrew, as abbat of Saint Martin's, in 796. A. F. Gfroerer comments on the importance of the schools of Aquitaine, Concha, Galuna, and Aniane: Allgemeine Kirchengeschichte, 3. 702 sqq., Stuttgart 1844.

in conformity with the accustomed routine of monastic schools : they made their pupils learn Greek so thoroughly that more than half-a-century later Bede says that some of them still remained who knew Greek as well as their mother-tongue. *An Englishman too, Benedict Biscop, the friend of Wilfrid, who had attended Theodore on his road from Rome to Canterbury and had held for a while the abbacy to which Hadrian succeeded, helped forward the advancement of his countrymen in another way. He was a sedulous collector of books and took advantage of repeated journeys to Rome to return ^bladen with purchases or the gifts of friends, gathered thence or from places on the road. With these he endowed the abbey which he erected at Wearmouth; and among his last charges to the brethren of his house we read that ^c'he enjoined them to keep jealously the precious and very rich library, indispensable for the learning of the church, which he had brought from Rome,—bibliothecam quam de Roma nobilissimam copiosissimamque advexerat, ad instructionem ecclesiae necessariam,—and not to suffer it through carelessness to decay or to be dispersed abroad.'

INTRODUC-TION.* Bed. hist.
abbat.
Vyram. iii.
pp. 373 sq.,
ed. Moberly^b Ibid.^c Cap. ix.
p. 380.

The example of these three men was not lost upon the English. ^dEaldhelm who, pedant as he was, ranked among the most learned men of his time, passed from his Scottish master at Malmesbury to the school of Hadrian at Canterbury; and ^ea goodly band of other scholars (Greek is their peculiar qualification) went forth from this latter place to spread their knowledge over England. But it was in the north that the new learning took deepest root. At Jarrow, the offshoot of Benedict Biscop's monastery of Wearmouth, ^flived and died Bede; the writer who sprang at once into the ^d Bed. hist.

eccl. v. 18
p. 330.^e See Bright 237 sq.^f Cf. Green,
mak. of Engl.
398-404.

INTRODUC-
TION.

^g Hist. eccl.
v. 24 p. 365.

A.D. 735.

† 804.

^h Ver. 1300-1317 Jaffé 6.
x21: cf. ver.
684 sqq., 742
sq.

ⁱ Ver. 1302-1311.

position of a father of the church, and whose influence was by far the greatest and most unquestioned of any between saint Gregory and saint Bernard. He is a witness to the excellence of Benedict's collection of books: for though, he says, 'I spent my ^g whole life in the dwelling of my monastery,' he shows an extent of knowledge in classical literature and natural science entirely unrivalled in his own day and probably not surpassed for many generations to come. Yet, be it remembered, it was first and foremost as a theologian and interpreter of the Scriptures that the middle ages revered him; and it is as an historian and the father of English historians that we now see his greatest distinction. Nor can the student of his works fail to recognise that Bede, like Ealdhelm, combined the current which flowed eastward from Ireland with that which came with Benedict from Canterbury. His genial and versatile learning is no less characteristic than the loyalty in which he held fast to the strict tradition of the Catholic church. A child of Bede's in spirit, though he was probably not born until about the year of the master's death, was destined to take back his tradition to the continent at the opportunity when it was first ripe to receive the stimulating influence.

Alcuin faithfully carries on the current of learning in the north of England of which Bede is the headspring. In his poem ^h On the Pontiffs and Saints of the Church of York he describes his master's work in language which shows us the distinctive qualities for which his disciples valued him:

ⁱ Discere namque sagax iuuenis seu scribere semper
Fervidus instabat, non segni mente laborans:
Et sic proficiens est factus iure magister.

Plurima quapropter præclarus opuscula doctor
 Edidit, explanans obscura volumina sanctæ
 Scripturæ, nec non metrorum condidit artem;
 De quoque temporibus mira ratione volumen,
 Quod tenet astrorum cursus, loca, tempora, leges,
 Scripsit, et historicos claro sermone libellos;
 Plurima versifico cecinit quoque carmina plectro.

INTRODUC-
 TION.

Alcuin, like Bede, was a teacher and an organizer of learning, a man of wide reading rather than of original thought. His position in the church at York had afforded him access to a library of unusual compass.

¹⁹In the poem just quoted he gives a list of these volumes; ¹ Ver. 1535-1561 pp. 128 sq. it can only be a selection of what he thought the most important. Among them appear the Greek fathers, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Basil,—likely enough in their original tongue¹⁹;—with a good number of the Latins. Of classical poets are named Vergil, Statius, and Lucan; of their degenerate successors, Sedulius, Juvencus, Arator, and Fortunatus. History is represented by Pompeius Trogus, that is, in the abridgement which we know as Justin, and Bede; natural history by Pliny. Cicero is named only as an orator. For logic Alcuin mentions Aristotle,—certainly in a Latin guise²⁰,—and the translators and commentators, Victorinus and Boëthius; for grammar Donatus, Priscian, and Servius. These are the better known of the authors recited in this interesting poem. Alcuin studied them with the simple purpose of fitting himself to be a teacher. He adopts and adapts, as he thinks most appropriate to his scope; but he

¹⁹ Bishop Stubbs thinks that the York library actually contained manuscripts both in Greek and Hebrew: Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography, art. Alcuin, i. 73 a; 1877. But Alcuin's words, de Pontif. 1535-1539, Jaffé p. 128, need not be pressed to mean more than the source from which the literature he mentions was derived; he says nothing unequivocally of the language.

²⁰ Most probably the reference is to the abridgement of the Categories then ascribed to saint Augustin: cf. Hauréau i. 93-97.

INTRODUC-
TION.

creates nothing. On the problems which were so soon to agitate the schools, the nature of being, and the relation of objects to thought, he has little to say of his own; his ¹psychology is directly derived from saint Augustin, his logic from the abbreviators of Aristotle. ^m Learning in England had indeed begun to decline, but before the process had gone too far, Alcuin transplanted it; and, whatever his intellectual limitations, just such a man was needed to set on foot a sound system of education in the Frankish realm.

ⁿ Mullinger
110-123.

It has been ⁿ maintained that Alcuin, at least in his later years, and the Scots with whom he worked held opposed positions in this movement; that Alcuin remained true to the tradition of saint Gregory, while the Scots allowed too great a latitude in their learned ambition; that Alcuin treated them as rivals, almost as enemies to the truth. Nor is this view altogether groundless. There was without doubt a certain national jealousy subsisting between the English and the Scots; and Alcuin clearly resented the predominance which the latter threatened to assume when, as an imaginative writer under Charles's grandson relates, ^o 'almost all Ireland, regardless of the barrier of the sea, comes flocking to our shores with a troop of philosophers.' There were also differences of ecclesiastical detail. Even in matters of doctrine more than once the Scots had given cause of offence: ^p they had, it should seem, with their Greek learning, drawn more deeply from the wells of oriental theology than was approved by the cautious judgement of their age. A certain Clement, as saint

^o V. infra, p.
74 n. 23.

^p Cf. Haddan
274, 284.

A. D. 744.

^q Bonif. ep.
I. Jaffé 3.
140.

Boniface reports, had ^q denied the authority of the fathers and canons of the church, and besides holding some views dangerous to morality, had gone so far as to teach that Christ by his descent into hell delivered all its prisoners, the unbelieving with the righteous²¹; and Virgil, bishop of Salzburg, had maintained the existence of antipodes 'in defiance of God and of his own soul,' because thus apparently he limited the sphere of the Saviour's work of redemption just as Clement had enlarged it. Besides these facts there was an unquestionable repugnance between the plain, solid English temperament and the more adventurous, speculative genius of their neighbours. If it be said with truth now that the two peoples are incapable of understanding one another, it is manifest that they are not likely to have made that acquaintance at a comparatively early date from their first introduction. That however Alcuin and the Irish stood apart in the matter of learning, that Alcuin despised secular literature and forbade his scholars to cultivate it, we hold to be an entirely unfounded presumption: its sole positive basis lies in a story told by a monkish biographer who was not even a contemporary and who relates the affair simply in order to show the master's miraculous gift of clairvoyance. It was fitting enough that Alcuin should have remonstrated with those who studied their Vergil to the exclusion or depreciation of the Bible; but the fact proves nothing as to his general regard for letters, and the testimony of his writings and acts is more eloquent than such private admonitions. Alcuin and the Scots, we take it, laboured, with whatever transient jealousies,

INTRODUC-
TION.

A. D. 748.

Ep. lxxvi. p. 191.

Vit. Alcuin.
x. Jaffé 6.
24 sq.Epp. ccvi.
pp. 713 sq.
ccxliii. p. 783;
cf. epp. cxix.
p. 485, cclii.
p. 803.Cf. Alc. ep.
xcviii. pp.
408 sqq.

²¹ 'Quod Christus, filius dei, descendens ad inferos omnes quos inferni carcer detinuit inde liberasset, credulos et incredulos, laudatores dei simul et cultores idolum.' See saint Boniface's letter to the pope, Zacharias, ep. l., Jaffé 3. 140.

Clement also, though a priest, apparently a bishop, was a married man with a family, and advocated marriage with a deceased brother's wife in conformity with the Jewish law: ep. xlviii, p. 133.

INTRODUC-
TION.

A. D. 826.

* Mansi, ubi
infra, p. 494.

in a common love of learning. The old temper which regarded religion and letters as irreconcilable opposites, was clean forgotten; the spirit is caught up by the rulers of the church themselves; and soon * a Roman council held under the pope, Eugenius the Second, can make a canon enjoining all diligence in the search for teachers to be appointed in all places to meet the necessities of the age, *masters and doctors to teach the study of letters and liberal arts, and the holy doctrines which they possess, since in them chiefly are the divine commands manifested and declared*²².

A. D. 829.

† Conc. Paris.
sext. iii. 12
Mansi p.
599.

That such an ordinance as this should have been required proves how much the learning of the new empire had lost its vigour and its wide diffusion in the troubled years that followed the emperor's death. Indeed barely fifteen years had passed since that event, when the prelates of Gaul appealed to Lewis the Pious to carry out the mandate issued by the Roman council, and to save the ruin into which the educational institutions of the country had already fallen. † We earnestly and humbly petition your highness, they said, that you,

²² See the dissertation of Wilhelm von Giesebrecht, De Litterarum Studiis apud Italos primis medii Aevi Saeculis, II, Berlin 1845 quarto. The 34th canon of the Roman council, as re-enacted in an assembly presided over by Leo the Fourth in 853, is as follows: 'De quibusdam locis ad nos refertur non magistros neque curam invenire pro studiis litterarum. Idcirco in universis episcopis subiectisque populis, et aliis locis in quibus necessitas occurrerit, omnino cura et diligentia habeatur ut magistri et doctores constituentur, qui studia litterarum liberaliumque artium ac sancta habentes dogmata, assidue doceant; quia in his maxime divina mani-

festantur atque declarantur mandata:.' in archbishop Mansi's edition of the Concilia, 14. 1008, Venice 1769 folio. For 'ac sancta habentes dogmata' there is a variant 'habentium dogmata'; but though the 'sancta' seems required to justify the word 'dogmata,' I am not sure but the genitive 'habentium' is more suitable to the context than 'habentes.' The authoritative admonition was appealed to three centuries later by Abailard, as against the detractors of secular learning in his day: Introd. ad theol. ii., Opp. 2. 69; Theol. Christ. ii., ib. p. 442, ed. V. Cousin, Paris 1859 quarto.

following the ensample of your father, will cause public schools to be established in at least three fitting places of your realm, that the labour of your father and yourself may not through neglect (which God forbid) utterly decay and perish: so, they added, shall great benefit and honour abound to God's holy church, and to you a great reward and everlasting remembrance. Still the impulse given to civilisation by the work of Charles, however intermittent its effects may appear,—dying out, as it seemed, by degrees until the second revival of the eleventh and twelfth centuries,—was never wholly lost. Nor was the decline of literature so rapid as is frequently supposed²³; the change is rather from a creative to an appropriating age. In the eager life of Charles's day men had leisure for independent study and production: under his successors they were, as a rule, content with a reputation for learning. To be well-read and to reproduce old material, was all that was asked of scholars; and the few who overpassed the conventional boundary of the republic of letters found that they did it at their peril.

INTRODUC-
TION.

Nevertheless, even with these limitations, the age succeeding that of Charles the Great, partly from the very imperfection of its intellectual vision, was able to

²³ For example, Dr Hermann Reuter, Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung im Mittelalter, i. 16, Berlin 1875, has no justification in inferring from the words of Claudius of Turin, 'Nec saecularis litteraturae didici studium nec aliquando exinde magistrum habui' (praef. in Levit., Jo. Mabillon, Vet. Analect. 90, ed. Paris 1723 folio) that instruction was again becoming limited to the sphere of theology; since Claudius was brought up in Spain, when Christian letters were at their lowest ebb. Dr Reuter is equally unfortunate in referring

(ib. i. 15 and n. 7) to the same writer (praef. exposit. in ep. ad Eph., Mabillon 91) for evidence of the general decay of letters. Claudius is speaking of sacred learning; he has no interest in any other. On the state of literature under the later Carolings compare Carl von Noorden's Hinkmar Erzbischof von Rheims, 56, Bonn 1863; a dissertation written by an historical scholar who has but recently and prematurely passed from us, and for whose work and memory I would here express my gratitude and my personal respect.

INTRODUC-
TION.

* Gibbon, ch.
xv. vol. 2.
74, ed. Oxford 1827.

venture upon enterprises which had perhaps been suppressed in their birth under more regular and better organized conditions. In the first century of Christianity it has been said *that 'the disciples of the Messiah were indulged in a freer latitude both of faith and practice than has ever been allowed in succeeding ages.' A like criticism would be true with respect to the progress of thought after Charles's day. Not for many generations did philosophy assume that definite medieval guise in which it remained fixed until the dawn of modern history. The gates of theological orthodoxy were even less closely guarded. Hardly a century will elapse before we see, preparing or already matured, some of the characteristic problems of church-controversy, even then held of paramount importance, though none could foresee the sway they would hold over the minds of men hereafter. The sacerdotal basis of the church is attacked, the nature of the divine Trinity is subjected to cold analysis; the doctrine of predestination is revived, the doctrine of transubstantiation is invented. Such were the unexpected fruit of Charles' and Alcuin's husbandry. In the two following chapters we shall examine a few specimens of the literature and the speculations of the ninth century. The first examples will be taken from a class of writings but indirectly connected with learned studies, and will illustrate the free movement of thought with respect to religious, or, it may be, superstitious, usages and beliefs: the second chapter will attempt to delineate the character of the theology of the greatest philosopher whom Ireland sent forth to glorify the schools of continental Europe.

CHAPTER I.

CLAUDIUS OF TURIN AND AGOBARD OF LYONS.

IN the empire of Charles the Great the Latin church CHAP. I. advanced to a clearer consciousness of her individuality, as apart from her oriental sister, than was possible before the state as well as the church had a western head. The old points of controversy which had once been common to all Christendom now vanish away. From the time of the British Pelagius, the heresies of the west had occupied themselves with a different class of speculations from those which convulsed the eastern church. Henceforward we shall find the former to prevail almost exclusively. The last of the eastern heresies, eastern in spirit if not directly in origin, is stamped out with the condemnation of the Spanish adoptians by the council of Frankfurt, a *proceeding in which Alcuin A. D. 794. took a conspicuous part. The last controversy between * Cf. Stubbs, dict. Chr. biogr. i. 73 b. the churches is signalised by the repudiation of image-worship at the same council.

The immediate antecedents of this decision in the matter of image-worship are worthy of notice. The second council of Nicea, seven years earlier, had A. D. 787. unanimously approved the practice. ^b It had decreed, ^b Milman 2. 391 sqq.; cf. C. J. Hefele, conciliengeschichte 3. 439 sqq., Freiburg 1858. under penalty of excommunication, that images of the Saviour and of his mother, of angels, and of all saints and holy men, should be everywhere set up, should be treated as holy memorials and worshipped; only without that peculiar adoration which is reserved for God alone. In this ordinance the pope, Hadrian the First, concurred. The value of the pope's opinion was however now, and remained for several centuries, an extremely variable quantity. The famous Caroline Books, which (whatever be their actual authorship) indubitably proceed from the court of Charles the Great and from the closing years of the eighth century, ^cspeak with quiet assurance of certain usages as allowed rather by the ambition of Rome than by any apostolical tradition. Nor was this feeling confined to the atmosphere of the court. In the matter of image-worship the council of Frankfurt thought nothing of placing itself in direct opposition to the policy favoured by the pope. The council too was no mere Frankish diet; it was ^dattended by bishops from all the west, Spain and England, as well as by papal legates. But the authority of the latter was powerless against that of Charles, and the canons of Nicea were formally rejected. That the Greek contention in the end won acceptance is well known¹. But the process was silent and without express enactment, just as in the ^eeast the triumph over the iconoclasts was imperceptibly forgotten and images (in the strict sense) came to be unconsciously proscribed. At present, if the subject was discussed, as indeed it was with considerable vehemence, the question was how little, not how much, reverence could rightly be paid to images.

CHAP. I.

The extreme party on this side is represented by Claudius, bishop of Turin². A Spaniard, bred—if we

^c Libr. Car. i.
3 Migne 98.
1015 D.

^d Milman 3.
95.

^e See H. F. Tozer in George Finlay's hist. of Greece 2. 165 n. 3, ed. Oxford 1877.

¹ Gfroerer has collected the early traces of this rapid change, Kirchengeschichte 3. 938 sqq.

² The best account of him is still

Carl Schmidt's essay in Ilgen's Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1843 pt. 2.

may credit the testimony of his opponents—under one CHAP. I. of the leading heretics whom the council of Frankfurt condemned, he seems rather to have recoiled into a more decided, at least a more primitive, orthodoxy than to have been affected by his dangerous surroundings.
He became a master in one of the royal schools of Aquitaine³ and was so much trusted by the king, Louis the Pious, that when the latter succeeded to the empire of his father Charles, he raised Claudius, about the year 818⁴, to the see of Turin. His reputation was that of an interpreter of the Bible⁵. He wrote commentaries on most of the historical books of the Old Testament, on the Gospel according to saint Matthew, and apparently on all the Pauline Epistles. Of these however but one, on the Galatians, has been printed entire. The others are known only by prefaces and extracts; and some are not edited at all⁶. It is not in libros de cultu imaginum, 167 c, D; cf. 168 G.

³ 'In Alvenni cespitis arvo, in palatio pii principis domini Ludovici, tunc regis, modo imperatoris,' are his own words, Epist. dedic. in enarrat. in epist. ad Gal., in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum 14. 141 A, Lyons 1677 folio; by the pages of which I regularly cite also Jonas of Orleans, Dungal, and Agobard. The school is conjectured to have been at Ebreuil, Histoire littéraire de la France 4. 223.

⁴ Possibly a little earlier: Neander gives the date as 814, General History of the Christian Religion and Church 6. 216, transl. by J. Torrey, Edinburgh 1850.

⁵ 'Claudium... cui in explanandis sanctorum evangeliorum lectionibus quantulacunque notitia inesse videbatur, ut Italicae plebis (quae magna ex parte a sanctorum evangelistarum sensibus procul aberat) sanctae doctrinae consultum ferret, Taurinensi subrogari fecit ecclesiae,' says his enemy, bishop Jonas, praef.

⁶ Few writers have their works scattered through such a variety of collections. The Enarratio in epist. ad Gal. is printed in the Max. biblioth. patrum, ubi supra; for the rest we have only specimens published in the Vetera Analecta of Mabillon, the Bibliotheca mediae et infimae latinitatis of J. A. Fabricius, and in two collections of cardinal Mai. Some additional extracts are mentioned by Schmidt, who gives a detailed list of Claudius's known works and attempts a chronological arrangement, p. 44 n. 8, and in his article in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie: see too Mabillon p. 92, ed. 1723. All these pieces, I think, are collected in the hundred-and-fourth volume of Migne. How much besides lies hidden in the Vatican we cannot tell. Cardinal Mai's edition of the preface to Claudius's commentary on the likely that we lose very much by our defective information about them. He had not the faculty of lucid or graceful, or always even of grammatical, expression; and he repeatedly laments a defect which gave an irresistible opening to the ridicule of his literary enemies⁷. Far less did he bring the light of speculation or of original genius to bear upon the books he expounded. He compiled from the fathers—Augustin was his chosen master—for the benefit of those whose leisure or acquirements did not suffice for extensive reading. He commented with the view of edifying; and seeking an ethical or a spiritual lesson everywhere, he fell willingly into the pitfall of allegory⁸. His fearless pursuit however of the principles he had learned in the course of a wide, if irregular, study of the fathers, makes Claudius a signal apparition at a time when the material accessories of religion were forcing themselves more and more into the relations between man and God. The worship of images, of pictures, of the cross itself⁹, the belief in the mediation of saints, the efficacy of pilgrimages, the authority of the holy see, seemed to him but the means of deadening the responsibility of individual men.

CHAP. I.

Pauline Epistles is avowedly a specimen which he intended to follow by the whole work, Nova collect. vet. scriptor. 7. 274 n. 1, Rome 1833. He mentions also two codices at Rome of the Catena upon saint Matthew, Spicil. Roman. 4. 301, Rome 1840.

⁷ See for instance his preface to the Lib. informationum litterae et spiritus super Leviticum, Mabilon, p. 90, and that to his commentary on the Ephesians, ib. p. 92, where he speaks of his 'rustic speech.'

⁸ I think that Claudius's allegorising tendency has been exaggerated. He himself lays down the limit, 'scilicet ut/manente veritate historiae figuras intelligamus,' in Gal. cap. iv. p. 158 B.

⁹ Dr Reuter, Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung 1. 17, is surely guilty of an anachronism in speaking of the 'crucifix,' of the existence or possibility of which neither Claudius nor any of his opponents seem aware. See for example Jonas 168 H. Pictures of the crucifixion there doubtless were, and perhaps crosses bearing a painted figure; but these are not what we call 'crucifixes.'

Claudius sought to quicken this sense. He is sure CHAP. I. that if a man has a direct personal interest in his own welfare, if he does not rely on spiritual processes conducted by others on his behalf, nor tie his faith to material representations of the unseen, he can be the better trusted to walk aright. The freedom of the gospel he is never tired of contrasting with the bondage of the law, a bondage which he saw revived in the religious system of his day. Faith is incomplete without its corollary action, or, as he prefers to call it, love. With the works of the sacerdotal law he will have nothing to do¹⁰. Let no man trust in the intercession or merit of the saints, because except he hold the same faith, justice, and truth, which they held, he cannot be saved. Men choose the easy way before the hard one which consists in self-sacrifice¹¹. God commanded men to bear the cross, not to adore it: they desire to adore that which they will not spiritually or bodily to carry with them. So to worship God is to depart from him. The only acceptable service is that, born of faith and supported by the divine grace, which issues in an all-embracing love. The following short passage contains the sum of the ethical principles which he desired to take the place of a blind dependence on mere mechanical acts. Charity, he says, or love, is comprehended in four modes. By the first we must love God, by

‘ Apologet
ap. Jon.
Aurel. p. 1
F, H.

‘ Ibid. p. 1
D, H.

‘ Enarr. ii
Gal. iv. p.
161 C, D.

¹⁰ De admonitione et exhortatione unde rogasti quod scriberem, ut votum quod voverunt domino reddant; . . . nullam admonitionem meliorem potui invenire quam epistolae primae Pauli apostoli, quam misi, quia tota inde agitur ut merita hominum tollat, unde maxime nunc monachi gloriantur, et gratiam deo commendat, per quam omnis qui vovit, quod vovit domino reddat: praef. in epp. Pauli, Mai, Nov. Coll. 7. 275 sq.

¹¹ Quia videlicet nisi quis a semetipso deficiat, ad eum qui super ipsum est non appropinquat, nec valet apprehendere quod ultra ipsam est si nescierit mactare quod est: Apol. ap. Jon. p. 184 c. The sentence, according to Jonas, is adopted from saint Gregory.

CHAP. I.

the next ourselves, by the third our neighbours, by the fourth our enemies. Unless we have first loved God, we shall not be able to love ourselves; that is to say, to abstain from sin: and if we love not ourselves, what standard have we to love our neighbours? and if we love not our neighbours, much less shall we love our enemies. Whereof this is the proof, that for the sake of God we despise even our salvation, yea, and our very souls. Faith therefore alone sufficeth not for life, except a man love his neighbour even as himself, and not only not do unto him the evil which he would not unto himself, but also do unto him the good which he would have another do unto him; and so fulfil the universal law, namely, to abstain from evil and to do good.

With these thoughts in his heart, and longing to impress them upon his generation, Claudius passed to his diocese of Turin. His fiery and uncompromising temper met opposition and peril as inducements rather than obstacles to action. We are told that he often took up the sword with his lay comrades to drive back the Saracens when they pressed forward from their strong places on the coast of Spain or Gaul to overrun his country¹². But the paganism, as he held it, which reigned everywhere around him,—the offerings and images that defiled all the churches¹³,—formed the more present evil against which he set himself to do continual battle. ¹He called for the utter destruction of all images and pictures throughout his diocese. ¹He forbade the observance of saints' days, and the very mention of saints in the liturgy. Foremost in executing the work, he raised a storm about him:

¹ Jon. 168 G.

¹ Dungal. responsa contra perversas Claudii Taurin. episc. sententias, p. 223 F.

¹² Compare his reference to such expeditions, Mai, Nov. Coll. 7. 275.

¹³ Inveni omnes basilicas, contra

ordinem veritatis, sordibus anathematum et imaginibus plenas: Apol. ap. Jon. 170 D.

his life was not safe¹⁴. The people were passionately excited, but the ¹protection or favour of higher powers was probably with him, and his name is not to be added to the roll of martyrs who have perished for lack of sympathy with the grosser needs of their contemporaries.

CHAP. I.
¹ Ibid. p.
 199 D: cf. infra pp. 35
 sqq.

Yet the truth is that, with all his fanaticism, Claudius alone of his age grasped the inevitable consequences of its spiritual condition. It was an age of materialism, and there was no possibility that the images could remain in churches without the people worshipping them, or that if they worshipped them they would understand the nice distinction between this worship and that of God laid down by the second Nicene council¹⁵. Claudius denounces this inevitable polytheism. *If, he says, they worship the images of saints after the fashion of demons,—that is, of course, in the manner of the old gods of the country,—they have not left idols but changed their names*¹⁶. He was accused of inventing a new heresy. ¹*Nothing, he replies, can be falser. I preach no sect, but hold the unity and expound the verity of the church. Sects and schisms, heresies and superstitions, I have ever, so far as in me lay, stamped upon and crushed; I have fought with them and taken them by assault, nor will I ever, so far as in me lies, cease to combat them with the help of God.* He turns to

¹ Apol., ap.
 Jon. 169 F,
 170 A.

¹⁴ See his complaints in the Apologetic, ap. Jon. p. 171 C, and in a preface addressed to Theodemir as late as 823, ap. Mabillon, Vet. anal. 90; cf. p. 91.

¹⁵ Προσκύνησις was decreed, not λατρεία; cf. supra, pp. 27 sq.: a distinction which modern protestants find difficult to appreciate: The English language indeed allows great latitude to the signification both of 'worship' and 'adoration'; and the unique relation is only implied in 'idolatry' and certain hypothetical derivatives like 'Mariolatry.'

¹⁶ Saint Agobard expresses himself in almost the same words, De imag. xix. p. 291 C. Claudius proceeds: Si scribas in pariete vel pingas imagines Petri et Pauli, Iovis et Saturni, sive Mercurii, nec isti sunt dii nec illi apostoli; nec isti nec illi homines: ac per hoc nomen mutatur, error tamen et tunc et nunc idem ipse permanet semper: Apol., ap. Dungal. 201 G and Jon. 174 B, C.

CHAP. I. his accuser: ^m Why dost thou humble thyself and bow to false images? why bend thy body a slave before vain likenesses and things of earthly fashion? God made thee erect. Other animals are prone and look earthward, but thy face is raised towards God. Thither look, raise thine eyes thither; seek God above, so shalt thou have no need of things below. This is the basis of his teaching. Following closely in the track, often ⁿ quoting the very words, of Augustin, he repeats that ^o a spiritual religion is independent of the sensuous, is dragged down by any attempt to make it intelligible to the outward eyes: it looks directly towards God. For this reason he refuses to dwell even upon the humanity of Christ. The man Jesus did his work once for all: Claudius would turn men's thoughts to their glorified Lord. ^p When these worshippers of a false religion and superstition say, For the memory of our Saviour we worship, reverence, adore a cross painted and carved in his honour, they take no pleasure in our Saviour except that which pleased the ungodly, the shame of his passion and the scorn of his death. They believe of him what the ungodly, Jews or heathen, believed, who believed not in his resurrection; and they know not to think aught of him save as in anguish and dead; they believe and hold him in their hearts to abide continually in passion, nor consider nor understand that which the apostle saith, ^q Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more ¹⁷.

^m Apol., ap. Jon. 175 G: cf. lib. super Levit., Mabil. lon 90 sq.

ⁿ See Reuter 1. 19 & n. 17.
^o Praef. in Levit., Mabil. lon 97.

^p Apol., ap. Jon. 176 C, 177 C.

^q 2 Cor. v. 16.

^r Apol., ap. Jon. 177 H sq.

Claudius attacks every visible symbol and memorial of the life of Jesus. ^r You worship all wood fashioned after the manner of a cross, because for six hours Christ hung upon

¹⁷ This verse, it is interesting to note, was also a favourite with Berengar of Tours, who, in his resistance to materialistic Christianity, was in many respects the unconscious disciple of Claudius: De sacra coena 45, 94, 200, ed. A. F. and F. T. Vischer, Berlin 1834.

a cross. Worship then all virgins, because a virgin bare him. CHAP. I.
Worship stables, for he was born in one; old rags, for he was swaddled in them; ships, for he oftentimes sailed in them; asses, for he rode thereon. There is no end to his mockery. He excuses himself for it by the bitterness of the facts he has to withstand. "Ridiculous these things" Ibid. p. 178 G, H. all are, and to be mourned rather than written. We are compelled to allege foolishness against the foolish; against hearts of stone we must cast not the arrows of the word, not sage reasons, but volleys of stones. Thus he traverses and assails the whole circle of the popular religion of the Latin world. About pilgrimages alone he is more reserved. The fashionable pilgrimage to Rome he cannot indeed approve, but he admits that "it does not hurt every one, nor benefit every one" 18 Ibid. p. 189 A. But for the peculiar claims of the see of saint Peter he has nothing but derision. "The authority of the apostle ceased with his death" 19 Ibid. p. 193 G; cf. Dun-gal 211 B. his successors possess it just so far as their lives are apostolic. "He is not to be called apostolic who sits in the seat of the apostle, but he who fills the office of the apostle." 20 Apol., ap. Jon. 195 H sq.
Of them that hold that place and fulfil not its office the Lord hath said, "The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they say unto you, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say and do not." 21 Matth. xxiii. 2 sq.
 With equal clearness Claudius "expresses the distinction" 22 Enarr. in Gal. cap. i. p. 142 E. between the ideal church and the imperfect copy which represents it on earth.

It was probably opinions like these last which saved Claudius from any rebuke from the emperor for the ¹⁸ The reprint, p. 198 E, presents a variant still more guarded in language.

¹⁹ It seems doubtful whether 'aliis' or 'aliis succedentibus,' just after, can be pressed (with Gfroerer and Milman) to mean the whole episcopal order: I have therefore omitted the clause, and interpreted the whole sentence in the light of what follows.

CHAP. I.

greater part of his career²⁰. They pass almost without question even in the controversy raised by the publication of his Apologetic. His other views, too, if they went further than those accepted at the court, were at all events errors on the right side; iconoclasm was less reprehensible than the 'idolatry' of the Greeks. Those who were hottest in their repudiation of Claudius, used very similar language with regard to the other extreme.

^a De eccl. rer. exord. viii. Migne 114. 928.

^a Walafriid Strabo, who became abbat of Reichenau in 842, holds a scrupulous balance in the controversy; and Walafriid had been a pupil of Rabanus Maurus, and was in some sort a representative theologian of his age. How little, too, the style of argument adopted by his antagonist Jonas commends itself to modern catholics may be gathered from the ^bcautions and expostulations with which his Benedictine editors have thought it necessary to accompany him²¹. Claudius was in fact carrying to their logical issues principles which were virtually recognised by the council of Paris in 825, and which even fifty years later were mentioned by the papal librarian Anastasius, in a dedication to John the Eighth, as still holding their ground among *certain persons in Gaul*²² at a time when the Greek practice had won nearly universal acceptance in the west. We can therefore hardly take bishop Jonas at his word when he speaks of Claudius as an enemy of all the sincerest churchmen, the most devoted soldiers of Christ,

^b pp. 166, 167 H, 193 mg.

^c p. 169 C.

²⁰ I find this inference anticipated and extended by Gfroerer, Kirchengeschichte 3. 733. Schmidt, ubi supra, p. 62, thinks it implied by a passage in Jonas, p. 175 F, G, that Claudius had at one time come under the censure of the pope, a supposition not improbable in itself and rather confirmatory than otherwise of the suggestion in the text.

²¹ See the pregnant note, Cautela lege, p. 195 H, marg.

²² Quibusdam dumtaxat Gallorum exceptis, quibus utique nondum est harum [imaginum] utilitas revelata: Mansi 12. 983 D.

in Gaul and Germany: we know indeed from a ^dfriend CHAP. I. who was also Claudius' opponent in this respect, that ^dTheodemir. epist. ad Claud. ap. F. A. Zachari. biblioth. Pistor. 60, Turin 1752 folio. in spite of his action in the matter of images, his commentaries on the Bible were received with eager enthusiasm by not a few of the highest prelates of Gaul.

Claudius therefore took no pains to defend himself until he had carried on his warfare during a number of years. His Apologetic—a defiant proclamation of his views—he at last addressed to his former friend, the abbat Theodemir, who had warned him of the perilous course he was taking. The answer was a ^ecouncil of bishops held ^eDungal 223 H, Jonas 167 D. at Lewis's court, and a condemnation; but Claudius can hardly have been much awed by what he is reported to have termed ^f*an assembly of asses*. Nor was his refusal ^fDungal, l. c. to attend followed by any measure to reduce him to obedience. The emperor, more, it should seem, to conciliate these prelates than from any serious intention of controlling Claudius, sent ^gextracts of the offending ^gJonas 167 D, E. book to Jonas, bishop of Orleans, with the desire that he would refute it. These extracts are all that remain to us of what to the historian is Claudius' most valuable work ²³: the refutation did not appear until after its object's death. Meantime, Dungal, a Scottish teacher of Pavia, issued a vehement Reply, ^hearnestly invoking the ^hDungal 199 F. imperial aid in suppressing the new heresy. Theodemir also returned to the controversy. Perhaps we may ⁱinfer ⁱCf. Schmidt ubi supra, p. 64. from Jonas' unwillingness to publish his polemic, that Claudius as he aged had tempered his fire: more probably Jonas himself found that the act would not increase his ²³ The fragments are collected in two pages of the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum 14. 197 sqq., which give an appearance of continuity to what is really a string of extracts by no means regularly consecutive.

Moreover the text is so inaccurate and the punctuation so bewildering that I have preferred to seek the originals in the pages of Dungal and Jonas themselves.

CHAP. I.

* F. Ughell.
Ital. sacr. 4.
1432 A, B,
Rome 1659
folio.
1 Jon. 167 E, F.

favour with the emperor. Be this as it may, the bishop lived more than ten years after he had sent forth his defence, to all appearance without let or molestation from any one. * His strenuous career was closed not earlier than 839, but he left behind him disciples enough to stimulate controversy. His writings too, with the exception of the Apologetic, were rapidly multiplied and diffused. His fame as a commentator secured the survival of a good deal of his peculiar teaching; but it is hazardous, if not impossible, to connect him in any direct way with the appearance of similar opinions, whether in the congregations of the Waldenses centuries later, or in those isolated puritan outbreaks which repeatedly confront us in the course of medieval history.

A. D. 779.

In his protest against the invocation of saints Claudius perhaps stood alone, but in the other points in which he separated himself from the current doctrine he had a supporter (there is, indeed, no evidence to place them in actual association) of far greater ability and far wider influence in the person of saint Agobard. Like him, born in Spain, Agobard was more fortunate in his education. He was brought up from an early age in the south of Gaul, at a time when the impulse given to learning by Charles the Great was in its first vigour: of that civilisation Agobard remained the representative when its founders were dead, and its spirit was falling into decay. Leidrad, archbishop of Lyons, bred him for his successor, made him co-bishop, and after some years secured his appointment to the see when he retired to a cloister in 816²⁴. Agobard's life as archbishop

²⁴ I date the events in Agobard's life according to a manuscript notice quoted, and beyond doubt rightly assigned to this prelate, by Mabilcorresponds closely with the reign of Lewis the Pious; CHAP. I. he died on the 8th June, 840, in the same month as the emperor.

Success was prepared for him by others: he deserved it by his contribution to the defence of the orthodox belief against the heresy of the adoptians. But he continued always entirely unaffected by the circumstances of a high position. Independent and regardless of consequences, he held to the principles which he enounced, with unconquerable audacity. He saw the masses around him sunk in a state of sluggish credulity, and instead of leaving them there, as others did, in the opinion that a debased people is the easiest to govern, he laboured hard for their liberation and attacked unsparingly every form of superstition wherever he found it. His thoughts were wider than Claudius's, but in the matter of images the Gallic and Italian prelates were of one mind. If the former was the less active in carrying his views into practice, it was not for want of firm conviction. Certainly he was not withheld by the risk of any opposition he might encounter in the Frankish church. He wrote in the same strong spirit, now of persuasion, now of rebuke, as Claudius; but no controversy ever arose over his utterances. The heads of the church were with him; but at the same time the masses were fast bound by superstition. Agobard may have calculated the injury which the character of an iconoclast would inflict upon his personal influence over them. He may have felt the hopelessness of the undertaking, and held it wiser, and in lon, Iter Italicum 68, Paris 1687 quarto. Bouquet, 6. 190 B marg. and note (1749), infers from the chronicle of Ado of Vienne, a. 815 (so also in Pertz's edition, 2. 320), that Agobard's elevation took place a year earlier. P. Piolin, the latest editor of Gallia Christiana, 4. 55 D, Paris 1876 folio, dates it as early as 814.

CHAP. I.

the end more effectual, to elevate the people gradually by the voice of reason.

The difference, therefore, between him and Claudius regards chiefly the means to carry out their common views. But Agobard is always guided by a calmer and ⁿ Cap. xxxii. p. 294 E.

^m Lib. contra eorum superstitionem qui picturis et imaginibus sanctorum adorationis obsequium deferendum putant, xxxiii. 294 F.

clearer perception than his vehement ally. ^m He desires, indeed, the removal of all pictures from the churches, but he admits that they are essentially innocent and only rendered pernicious by abuse. ⁿ The ancients, he says, had figures of the saints, painted or carved, but for the sake of history, for record not for worship; as, for example, the acts of synods, wherein were portrayed the catholics upheld and victorious, and the heretics by the discovery of the falsehood of their vile doctrine convicted and expelled, in memorial of the strength of the catholic faith, even as pictures stand in record of foreign or domestic wars. Such we have seen in divers places: yet none of the ancient catholics held that they should be worshipped or adored. ^o The pictures in churches should be looked at just as any other pictures. Only the faithlessness of the age, which will find some special virtue in them, forces him to condemn them utterly. ^p God must be worshipped without any sensuous representations. ^q Whosoever adoreth a picture or a statue, carved or molten, payeth not worship to God nor honoureth the angels or holy men, but is an idolater: he is beguiled to

^o Cap. xxxiii. p. 294 F.

^p Cap. xxiv. p. 292 D.

^q Cap. xxxi. p. 294 D: cf. ep. ad Barthol. vii. p. 282 C.

^r 2 Cor. xi. 14. evil under the fairest disguises of devotion; ^r Satan transformeth himself into an angel of light. The opposition of spirit and matter is as real to him as to Claudius. He, too, saw that ^s visible objects were a hindrance not a help to the perception of the invisible. ^t When faith is taken from the heart, then is all trust set on visible things.

^s Capp. xv., xvi. p. 290 B, D.

^t Cap. xxxiii. p. 294 F.

The rule thus stated Agobard proceeds to apply to the 'vulgar errors' of his day. Want of faith is the root of superstition: it is nurtured by unreason. ^a The wretched CHAP. I. world lies now under the tyranny of foolishness: things are ^a Lib. con believed by Christians of such absurdity as no one ever could ^a insulam aforetime induce the heathen, who knew not the Creator of all, ^a vulgi opito believe. Of the various works which he wrote upon ^a nionem de this subject, not the least interesting, and certainly the ^a grandine most curious, is the treatise Against the absurd Opinion of ^a tonitruis, the Vulgar touching Hail and Thunder. It appears that ^a p. 275 B.

^a there was a class of impostors who assumed to themselves ^a Cap. i., the office of 'clerk of the weather.' These tempestarii, ^a pp. 271 D, or weather-wizards, claimed the power not only of con- ^a 274 G.
trolling the weather, and securing the fields from harm, but also of bringing about hail and thunder-storms, ^a Cap. iii.
and ^a 272 H.
especially of directing them against their private enemies.
^a Plainly they derived a goodly revenue from a black ^a Cap. xv.
mail forced by the double motives of fear and hope. ^a 274 G.
^a We have seen and heard, says Agobard, many who are over- ^a Cap. ii.
whelmed by such madness, carried away by such folly, that ^a 271 F, G.
they believe and assert that there is a certain region called Magonia—no doubt the Magic Land—whence ships come in the clouds: the which bear away the fruits of the earth, felled by hail and destroyed by storms, to that same country; and these sailors of the air forsooth give rewards to the weatherwizards, and receive in return the crops or other fruits. Certain ones have we seen, blinded by so dark a folly, who brought into an assembly of men four persons, three men and a woman, as having fallen from the said ships; whom they held in bonds for certain days and then presented before an assembled body of men, in our presence, as aforesaid, that they should be stoned.
Howbeit the truth prevailed, after much reasoning, and they who brought them forward were confounded. He condescended to seek evidence of the power of the weatherwizards, but could obtain no account at first hand.

CHAP. I.

^b De grand.
vii. p. 273 H
sq.

^b People were confident that such or such a thing had been done, but they were not present at its performance. It was this credulous habit of mind that irritated Agobard. He disdained to allege scientific reasons to overthrow what was in its nature so unreasonable. He could only fall back on the same broad religious principles which had guided him in his repudiation of images. There, he says, our relation to God must be direct and without the intervention of sensible objects: ^chere, conversely, that God's relation to nature is immediate and least of all conditioned by the artifices of men. He acknowledges that ^d*almost every one, in these regions, noble and simple, citizen and countryman, old and young*, believes that storms are under human control, and attributes the work of God to man. ^eHe spares no words in condemning this infidelity which ^f*believes partly in God, partly that God's words are of men; hopes partly in God, partly in men.*

^c Capp. ix.,
xiv. pp. 273 D,
274 F.

^d Capp. i., xiv.
pp. 271 D, E,
274 F.

^e Cap. xi. p.
273 H.

^f Cap. xv. p.
274 H.

^g Ep. ad
Barth. episc.
Narbon. de quorundam illusionem sig-norum, i. p.
281 D, E.

With equal vigour he opposed superstitions which tended to the profit of the church. To his straightforward vision they were the more dangerous, since they degraded the church with the people, instead of maintaining it pure, as a light shining in darkness. ^gThere was an epidemic at a place, so he writes to bishop Bartholomew of Narbonne, the causes of which were traced to the activity of evil spirits. The terrified people crowded to the church and lavished offerings of silver and gold and cattle, whatever they possessed, at the feet of saint Firmin. The bishop in perplexity wrote to Agobard for advice: his answer was a warning against the faithlessness implied in trusting to the power of the saint to ward off visitations which proceed from the hand of God. The devil no doubt is at work, but not in the way these people supposed ; his action is far less physical than mental : he is seen to prevail over some men, not so much for the purpose of striking them down as of deluding them. It is difficult to overestimate the change which the acceptance of Agobard's view would have caused in the popular beliefs of the middle ages. The continual visitations of evil spirits of which the history is full would then have resolved themselves into the creatures of a disordered imagination ; the latter, not the former, being the work of the devil : those who believed in his direct visitation, not its supposed victims, were really under his influence.

^h For his success, Agobard explains, requires a receptivity on men's part, lack of faith or delight in vanity ; and with these favourable conditions he can indeed lead them helplessly to destruction and death. Agobard gives else-

^h Cap. vii. p. 282 C.

where a remarkable illustration. ⁱ A few years since, he says, a certain foolish story went abroad when there was a murrain of oxen : it was said that Grimoald, duke of Benevento, sent out men with powder to scatter over the fields and mountains, meadows and springs, forasmuch as he was enemy to the most Christian emperor Charles ; by reason of which powder the oxen died. For this cause we have heard and seen many persons to be apprehended and certain slain. Agobard comments on the absurdity of the tale. He asks why only the oxen and no other animals suffered, and further how the murrain could extend over so large a tract of land, when if all the inhabitants of Benevento, men, women, and children, each with three wagons full of powder, had been employed, they could not possibly have sprinkled powder enough. But, what, he adds, was most strange, the prisoners themselves bare testimony against themselves, affirming that they had that powder, and had scattered it. Thus did the devil receive power against them

ⁱ De grand. xiv. pp. 274 H sq.

CHAP. I.

by the secret but righteous judgement of God, and so greatly did he prevail that they themselves were made false witnesses unto their own death.

But the influence of the devil, in Agobard's thought, is actually little more than the conventional expression—for Agobard was before all things orthodox—for men's proclivity to unreason and faithlessness²⁵. Superstition might take the form, as we have seen hitherto, of their claiming powers which really belong to God. It was none the less superstition to postulate the intervention of God in cases where human judgement alone was necessary. For men to disregard the evidence of ascertained facts²⁶, and to call for perpetual miracles at their behest was impiety of the worst kind, making God in fact the servant of man. It is this argument, supported by copious citations from the Scriptures, that Agobard alleges against the popular customs of ordeal by fire or water and of wager of battle. Of the two usages the ordeal was probably the less prevalent: ^kit was discouraged and prohibited by the emperor²⁷; and Agobard

^jLib. de divinis sententiis digest. contra damnablem opinionem putantium divini iudicii veritatem igni vel aquis vel conflictu armorum patefieri, ii. p. 301 R.
^kCapit. Wormat., a. 829, Pert., legg. i. 352 § 12.

²⁵ Dr Reuter, i. 30, confesses himself unable to harmonise the account in the place last quoted and in the epistle to Bartholomew, vii, of the appearance of the devil 'als wirklich handelnder,' with the other passages in which his activity seems conditioned by the self-deception of men. But the professor has certainly drawn too definite an inference from Agobard's words when he represents him as saying, 'people are deceived because they deceive themselves.' Agobard in fact nowhere expresses himself without qualification, either on this head or on that of the devil's actual interference in human affairs. The words with which he closes the story given in the text, offering it as an example 'de inani seductione et vera sensus deminutione,' shew how closely connected in his mind the two ideas were. It is uncritical to link a number of detached phrases or epithets, chosen from different places, and to take credit for realising, when one is only confusing, an author's system.

²⁶ Utilitas iudiciorum constat in discussione causarum et subtilitate investigationum: Lib. adv. legem Gundobadi et impia certamina quae per eam geruntur, x. p. 265 H.

²⁷ It is significant that so representative a churchman as archbishop Hincmar of Rheims opposed this ordinance, C. von Noorden, Hincmar 173. Gottschalk also challenged the ordeal as a test of the truth of his opinions: ibid. p. 67.

may have deemed it unworthy of serious argument. He CHAP. I. applies his forces mainly to the exposure of the wrong—

¹ new, not lex,—involved in the test of combat. The ¹ Lib. adv. leg. Gund. xi. p. 266 c. ordeal indeed was destitute of any feature except the superstitions, while combat, as ^m Hallam observes, might ^m Middle ages, 3. 294, ed. 1872. be held to be partly redeemed by ‘the natural dictates of resentment in a brave man unjustly accused, and the sympathy of a warlike people with the display of skill and intrepidity.’ At Lyons, the old Burgundian capital, the latter institution, resting as it did on a law of the Burgundian king Gundobald, is ⁿ thought to have been ⁿ Gfroerer 3. 751. resorted to with peculiar frequency. ^o Agobard addressed ^o Lib. adv. leg. Gund. vii. p. 265 c. one of his two treatises on the subject to the emperor and implored him to suppress the evil. ^p He urged not ^p De div. sent. v. p. 302 B. only the religious objections, that God’s judgements are unsearchable and not lightly to be presumed, but also the arguments of common sense. The combat declares not the judgement of God but the right of the strongest, and gives a criminal encouragement to strife. ^q The van- ^q Lib. adv. leg. Gund. l. c. quished is cast into despair and loss of faith, while in many cases the conqueror proves his innocence by adding the guilt of murder. ^r If the test is worthy of confidence, ^r Cap. ix. p. 265 B, F. how came Jerusalem into the hands of the Saracens, Rome to be pillaged by the Goths, Italy by the Lombards? The martyrs of the church, the witnesses of truth, waxed strong by dying: the upholders of iniquity by killing perished.

With these various weapons, drawn from the armoury of reason, of experience, of religion, Agobard made war upon the superstitions of his age. He took his stand upon the unassailable ground of Christian verity, but he had his own opinions even in matters like the inspiration of the Bible. Thoughtful men over whose minds the authority of the Bible is supreme have always endeavoured to temper its severity by one of two modes of viewing it. Some enlarge its field by erecting an ample superstructure of allegory upon the literal text,—imagining that they are laying bare its deep, underlying truths,—a method which allows the utmost freedom or license of interpretation upon a servile and uncritical basis. In this way Claudius, and far more John the Scot, were able to bring the words of Scripture into harmony with their own teaching. Others, with a greater fidelity to the scope of the Bible, insist that the letter is subordinate to the spirit, to the general bearing of the book. Among these is Agobard. He rebukes Fredegisus, abbat of Tours, for the absurdity of holding that the words of Scripture are inspired²⁸: its sense is no doubt divine but its form is human²⁹. The same rule must be our guide in its interpretation. We must make it intelligible, even against the grammatical sense, so long as we preserve its spirit;—ut sacramento rei concordaret.

CHAP. I.

To this wide-reaching liberality there is one exception in the hostility which Agobard bore towards the Jews. But the archbishop's action was not simply that of a bigot, and the motive of the controversy in which he engaged was entirely honourable to him. He set his face against a flagitious custom of which the Jews, the great "slave-dealers of the empire, had the monopoly. 'He forbade the Christians of his diocese from selling slaves to the Jews

* H. Graetz, gesch. der Juden 5. 246, Magdeburg 1860.

¹ De insolentia Iudaeorum, p. 255 C.

²⁸ Quod ita sentiat de prophetis et apostolis ut non solum sensum praedicationis et modos vel argumenta dictionum spiritus sanctus eis inspiraverit, sed ipsa corporalia verba extrinsecus in ora illorum ipse formaverit: Lib. contra obiectiones Fredeg. abbat. xii. p. 277 R: an argument against all organic theories of inspiration.

²⁹ Usus sanctae scripturae est verbis condescendere humanis, quantum vim ineffabilis rei, humano more loquens, ad notitiam hominum deduceret et mysteria insolita solitis ostenderet rebus: ibid. vii. p. 276 R.

for exportation to the Arabs of Spain, and sought also CHAP. I.
 to place a variety of restrictions upon the intercourse of the two races. The emperor however supported the Jews, and Agobard could only resort to passionate appeals A.D. 826.
 to the statesmen of the palace and to the bishops, in the hope of reëstablishing a state of things more consonant with the principles of the church. We are not concerned to defend the curious slanders he repeats in his letter On the Superstitions of the Jews: it is sufficient that he believed them. But the truth was that under Lewis the Pious, particularly after his marriage with his second empress, Judith, the position of the Jews might fairly be held to menace Christianity. Charles the Great had shewn them tolerance; Lewis added his personal favour;
 and under him they enjoyed a prosperity without example in the long course of the middle ages³⁰. They formed a peculiar people under his own protection, equally against the nobles and the church; and their privileges were guarded by an imperial officer, the Master
 —he even claimed the title of King³¹—of the Jews. Free from military service, the Jews were indispensable to the commerce of the empire; on account of their financial skill it was common to trust them with the farm of the taxes. Nothing was left undone which might gratify their national or religious prepossessions. They had rights from which Christians were excluded, entire

³⁰ For the following outline I am chiefly indebted to Graetz, 5. 245-263. His remark as to the dishonesty of Agobard in baptising the slaves of Jews and thus emancipating them may be just: but Christians have at all times been liable to stretch their loyalty to honour at the call of religion, and Agobard asserts that the slaves begged to be baptised, De baptismo Iudaicorum mancipiorum, p. 262 E, F.

³¹ The chief rabbi of the synagogue of Narbonne asserted that Charles had granted him this dignity; certainly a street in this place was named Rey Juif: G. B. Depping, Die Juden im Mittelalter 99, Germ. transl., Stuttgart 1834.

CHAP. I.

^a De insol.
Iud., p. 255
G.

freedom of speech was allowed, and the very weekly ^amarkets were postponed to the sunday in order that the alien race might observe its sabbaths. The Jews built their synagogues, and held their lands and pastures; they planted vineyards and set up mills, in perfect security. At the court of the emperor they were welcomed with marked distinction. They went there with their wives, and were only known in the throng by the more sumptuous display of their apparel. The empress Judith was singularly attached to them, and the courtiers, taking up the fashion, attended the synagogue and admired the preaching of the darshanin above that of their own clergy.

It is evident that some motive nobler than jealousy or intolerance might actuate a churchman in resisting what he was bound to consider inimical to the interests of religion. Agobard's view of it was confirmed by the distrust he felt in the emperor's advisers, and in the empress. But we have not here to do with his position as a leader in the revolt which attempted to place Lothar on his father's throne, ^xinstructive as it may be as illustrating Agobard's application to the field of politics of that clear perception of right and wrong, that fearless and unswerving adherence to his beliefs, that we have found elsewhere ³². For his courage, as ^yGfroerer notes, is even more astonishing than the freedom of his vision. In the light of ten centuries we may think his arguments truisms and wonder at the pains he took to demonstrate

^x Cf. Reuter
I. 36.

^y Vol. 3. 753.

³² I am not sure that we can affirm, with von Noorden, pp. 38 sq., that Agobard's preference for the power of the ecclesiastical over the secular estate was caused by his conviction of the feebleness of Lewis's government. This may have decided him, but his moderation has not the tone of a convert: see for instance his letter to the emperor, De comparatione utriusque regiminis, ecclesiastici et politici, especially p. 315 E.

what seems to us to need no demonstration, to expose what is unworthy of exposure. But the fact remains that he stood absolutely alone in his generation, with the single exception of Claudius of Turin; and Claudius's interest was limited to a single branch of superstition, while Agobard undertook the destruction of the whole.

In both alike the influence of saint Augustin is paramount. It is, indeed, the continual interruption of long extracts from the fathers, and above all from Augustin, that too often defaces to our modern eyes the impression of lucidity and vigour which are the just attributes of Agobard's style. Whether or not in direct quotation the presence of the father's treatise On true Religion and of the City of God is seldom wanting. Doubtless Claudius and Agobard were here simply following the universal habit of the scholars of their day, with whom Augustin ranked second alone to the Bible; to contradict him, as Paschasius Radbert said, was impiety³³. But there were few who accepted his spiritual force and left out of account his extravagance of fancy; there were few who chose only his good part and wrought it with such wisdom, as these two did. * While others in the generation immediately following heard only the appeal of his less worthy utterances, the incongruous children of his genius, and were led into the opposite extreme of superstition³⁴, they used precisely those elements of his teaching which had a practical tendency. They found in him a beacon

³³ Augustinum quem contradicere fas non est: De partu virginis ii, in Luc d'Achery's Spicilegium sive Collectio veterum aliquot Scriptorum, i. 51 a, ed. F. J. L. de la Barre, Paris 1723 folio.

³⁴ The curious treatises of Paschasius Radbert and Ratramnus relating to the manner of Christ's birth will be found in d'Achery, ubi supra, pp. 44 sqq., 52 sqq. It may be observed that Paschasius addressed his exceedingly physiological disquisition to the matron and virgins of the convent of Vesona in the diocese of Périgord.

CHAP. I. to shed light upon the deepening obscurity of the age, a weapon to assail and overthrow its resistance to vital religion; and with this they were content. To enquire deeper into their master's thoughts, to speculate upon the mysteries of being and of God, was foreign to their purpose.

Agobard does, indeed, once venture upon the field of controversy in theological metaphysics; he wrote a book against Felix of Urgel, the adoptian: but here, too, he is still the theologian, not a philosopher. He recites the testimonies of the fathers, but he cares not to add to them his independent criticism. His reticence was justified by the experience of the years after him, when the attempt was made to *accommodate the spiritual system of Augustin to the concrete doctrines of the church, and the amalgam proved the strangest and most materialistic product of that materialistic age, the theory of transubstantiation. No innovation could have been better calculated to promote the decay of the moral individualism of Christianity, and the growth of a servile dependence upon the priestly order. It succeeded, not because it professed a conformity with saint Augustin, but because the age was tending towards intellectual degradation. When, however, some years later, Gottschalk, the medieval Jansen, revived from the same father an unconditional doctrine of predestination, the result was quite different. For this doctrine was as subversive as Claudius's puritanism of the newer theory of the church. A stimulus was given to controversy, but the issue was foregone. Latin Christianity had come to acquiesce in a belief which admitted God's predestination of the good, his foreknowledge only of the wicked: in the technical phrase of Calvinism, predestination but not reprobation.

* Cf. Reuter
I. 43.

When Gottschalk affirmed both, the language of saint Augustin had to be explained away. It was impossible that his authority could support tenets which, it was seen, struck at the root of the power of the clergy, not only by the implied denial of the efficacy of the sacraments, but also of the value of human absolution. Nor can we be surprised that the men of Charles the Bald's age failed to realise a time when these essentials of ecclesiastical salvation were so differently conceived that Augustin's view could be attacked, not for its heretical character, but for its inhumanity. His unseasonable restorer appeared to them guilty of the most hopeless, unpardonable heresy. It was discovered that his opinions included the most opposite errors, the denial of the freedom of man's will, and of the necessity of divine grace.

Few disputes ever had a more accidental origin. Gottschalk, the son of a Saxon noble, was forced as a child into the monastery of Fulda. When he grew up he rebelled, and denied the obligation of his father's vow. A council at Mentz, to which he appealed against the authority of his superior, reversed the sentence. The powerful abbat, it was none less than Rabanus Maurus, brought the case before the emperor and won his cause. The youth was condemned for life to the rule of saint Benedict. But the high-spirited ambition of his birth was quickened, not quenched, by his bondage. The fame he would have made in the active life of a noble, he now sought in the adventurous paths of speculation. He removed to the monastery of Orbais near Soissons, and buried himself in saint Augustin. The theory he developed in this seclusion had a natural affinity with the morbid cravings, the vindictive passions, of a disappointed man. It assuaged his regrets for lost earthly prosperity by the confidence of eternal happiness hereafter. It gave him a weapon with which to assail his opponents: their reward was already decided for them. He pressed the certainty of their doom with fanatical violence. The controversy which followed is too purely theological, too unrelieved by any warmth of human sympathy, by any real sense of human needs, to detain us in its dark and weary progress³⁵. It is of importance as introducing us to that astonishing thinker whose aid was rashly invoked against the monk of Orbais. The theological dispute was for a moment merged in the deep sea of philosophy: when it rose again the monk Gottschalk was forgotten; the voice of orthodoxy on all sides was directed against Johannes Scotus, the belated disciple of Plato, and the last representative of the Greek spirit in the west.

A.D. 829.

CHAP. I.

³⁵ The history here only glanced at is related in an admirably luminous chapter of von Noorden's Hinkmar 51-100.

CHAPTER II.

JOHN THE SCOT.

THE dispute about predestination had long perplexed the Frankish world when Hincmar, the great archbishop of Rheims, applied to John the Scot for help. Gottschalk had received his sentence from the council of Chiersey, and died after a long captivity in the monastery of Hautvilliers. But the controversy had failed, as controversies usually fail, to secure conviction to either side, and John gladly assumed that the fault lay in the incompetence of theology by itself to decide the profound questions involved. He began his book on the subject¹ by the announcement that true philosophy and true religion are identical; a solution of religious problems can only be effected by the aid of philosophy; and true philosophy rests on the basis of the unity of God. The oneness of his essence implies also a oneness of will, a will that can tend only towards good. To conceive a predestination to evil is to conceive a duality, a contradiction, in the divine nature. But predestination of any sort can only be improperly asserted of God, since he is independent of time. If we connect it with any notion

CHAP. II.

A.D. 840.

¹ Of the tract De praedestinatione, to which I had not access when I wrote the present chapter, Johannes Huber has given an elaborate analysis in his biography, Johannes Scotus Erigena 60-92, Munich 1861. A masterly summary appears in F. C. Baur's posthumous Christliche Kirche des Mittelalters 50-55, Tuebingen 1861. See also Gfroerer, Kirchengeschichte 3. 867 sqq.

CHAP. II. of necessity it cannot be asserted of him at all; since his will is absolute freedom; and man, as the highest image of God, possesses this same entire freedom of will, which he can use as he pleases for good or evil. There remains but one sense in which we can speak of God's predestination; that is, his permission of what happens in the creature by reason of his free will. He suffers this freedom of will, but when it moves to evil he knows it not; for God is ignorant of evil. If he knew it he would be the cause of it: we cannot separate his knowledge from his will, which is cause. For God, therefore, evil exists not; it has no cause, it is simply the negation of good. Sin, therefore, and its punishment come not from God. Every misdeed bears its punishment in itself, in the consciousness of lacking good. The eternal fire is a necessary part of God's universe. The righteous will rejoice in it; the wicked suffer, because they are wicked, just as (he quotes the simile from the Confessions of Augustin) the sunlight hurts the weak while it is harmless to sound eyes. The order of the world sets a limit within which each creature moves and which it cannot overpass. It sets a bound to the possibility of wickedness, but for which the wicked would fall into that nothingness which is the nature of evil. In this sense alone is punishment fore-ordained, that wickedness be not able to extend itself, as it would, into the infinite.

These are some of the arguments which the Scot brings against the contention of Gottschalk. We see at once their startling character. They were no doubt entirely unadapted to their purpose; it was no doubt vain to argue on philosophical grounds with men who relied exclusively on theology and on a one-sided selection of 'scriptural proofs.' But it is on this very account that the reasoning is memorable. There is nothing in it of the commonplaces of controversy or of theology. It has a terminology of its own. Outwardly, indeed, John Scot appeals, like his opponents, to the Bible, to Augustin, to the common church tradition. But these strains are actually those which give colour to a web of thought quite different in texture. Its material, indeed, is only partly Christian,—and this, as we find it in his matured system, is drawn from the Greek fathers, Origen, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa, more than from the Latins,—but most of all it comes from the heterogeneous manufacture of the latest Neo-Platonists, the men who sought to combine a religion which failed to satisfy the speculative instinct with the noblest philosophy of which they had information. The result was in any case a medley—‘the spurious birth,’ it has been *called, ‘of a marriage between philosophy and tradition, between Hellas and the East’—but the attempt was so plausible, so enticing, that it has never wanted defenders from the beginnings of Christianity, from Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen, to our own time.

CHAP. II.

Among these Johannes Scotus, called Ierugena or Erigena²,

² The biography of John Scot, which resolves itself mainly into a criticism of scanty and conflicting materials, was first attempted by F. A. Staudenmaier, a catholic professor at Giessen, whose Johannes Scotus Erigena und die Wissenschaft seiner Zeit, Frankfurt-am-Main 1834, was left unfinished. Its biographical conclusions are for the most part reproduced in the Leben und Lehre des Joh. Scotus Erigena, Gotha 1860, of Dr Theodor Christlieb, now professor at Bonn. A more sceptical criticism is applied, in the life already referred to, by Dr Huber, late professor at Munich, and well known for his spirited action in connexion with the oecumenical council of 1869–1870. As for the name of the Irish philosopher the following facts may be accepted as ascertained: (1) he was known to contemporaries as Ioannes Scotus, Scottus, or Scotigena; (2) in his translation of Dionysius, and there only, he designates himself Ioannes Ierugena; (3) Ierugena is the oldest form that appears in the manuscripts, but it soon alternates with Erugena (in a copy of the beginning of the eleventh century, Saint John's college, Oxford, cod. cxxviii) and Eriugena; (4) Erigena does not make its appearance until later,

* Jowett, dial. of Plato 3, 524, ed. 2, Oxford 1875.

CHAP. II. is an unique figure, not so much by the originality of his views, as by the confidence with which he discovered them latent in Christianity. He is unrestrained by the habits of thought of his own age, in which he appears as a meteor, none knew whence. The mystery which surrounds him is appropriate for his solitary person. From the schools of Ireland he drifted, some time before the year 847, to the court of Charles the Bald,^b like those former 'merchants of wisdom' with whom tradition afterwards associated him. The ^cwelcome he won from that liberal-minded prince and their intimate comradeship, the gaiety and sprightly humour of the Irish sage, his removal to England after Charles's death, and his new career as a teacher under the auspices of king Alfred, finally his murder at Malmesbury; ^dall these things are recounted by later annalists. His own time knows only that he was 'a holy man' who came from Ireland and (but this record is open to question) presided over the school of Paris³. It does not even inform us whether he was clerk or layman.

^b supra, pp. 16 sq.

^c Will. Malmesh. gest. pontif. v. 240 pp. 392 sq., ed. Hamilton.

^d v. infra, p. 59: cf. append. i.

while (5) the combination of the three names cannot be traced beyond the sixteenth century. See Christlieb 15 sq. It is an unwelcome consequence that the time-honoured title of Erigena must be finally withdrawn from currency. On its meaning it is difficult to form a decided opinion. Probably it is derived from Erin or Ierne and modulated so as to suggest lepós. In any case Gale's notion (Testimonia, prefixed to his edition of the De divisione naturae, p. 8) that its bearer came from Eriuen or Eri-gene in the Welsh marches is to be rejected.

³ His birth is ironically touched on by an opponent, Prudentius of Troyes, 'Te solum omnium acutissimum Galliae transmisit Hibernia,'

De Prædest. contra Io. Scot. xiv Max. Biblioth. Patr. 15. 534 E; 1677: his character appears from a letter of the librarian Anastasius, 'Ioannem . . . Scotigenam, virum quem auditu comperi per omnia sanctum,' Usher, Epist. Syllog. 65. Finally his mastership of the Paris school can only have been of short duration, since pope Nicholas the First writes in 860 or 862 calling for John's removal from Paris 'in studio cuius capital iam olim fuisse perhibetur,' ap. C. E. du Boulay, Hist. Univ. Paris. i. 184, Paris 1665 folio. I notice that this passage in the papal letter is not found in the recognised copies, e.g. Mansi, Concil. 15. 401 c, and that du Boulay, p. 183, admits that he took it from the collectanea of Naudé; so

The king's regard for the sage, which we know also from his own poems and dedications, might be inferred from the appointment which he is presumed to have held at Paris. For although the little town upon the Seine was hardly yet recognised as the key of northern Gaul, and was by no means the ordinary seat of government, it was a favourite and not infrequent residence of the king—he was not yet emperor—whose capital lay at Compiègne or Laon. It owed its popularity at first no doubt to its neighbourhood to Saint Denys, whose fame had attracted thither the dying Pippin and made his great-grandson Charles choose the abbey for the burial-place of his house⁴; and it was this same connexion which gave the Irish scholar the first opportunity for making his value felt. The story that the foundation dated from the Areopagite Dionysius, the earliest Athenian convert of saint Paul, was at this time universally accepted; there was as yet no Abailard to contest it. The renown of the abbey added dignity to its supposed author; and when writings ascribed to him with an equal credulity, were brought into the west⁵, their purport aroused a natural curiosity, if only a translator could be found to reveal their treasures. Now Greek letters had never wholly died out in the Irish schools⁶, and John had skill enough to furnish that a suspicion arises that it may be merely one of those fictions invented for the glorification of the antiquity of the university of Paris, just as a later incident in John Scot's life has been applied to that of the university of Oxford. Cf. Léon Maitre, Écoles épiscopales et monastiques 45, Le Mans 1866.

⁴ Mr E. A. Freeman has well told the history of the revival of Paris in the ninth century: see his essay on The early Sieges of Paris, Historical Essays, 1st series, viii.

⁵ It seems that before the present of the Byzantine Michael the Stammerer to Lewis the Pious in 827, Staudenmaier 1. 162 and n. 2, works of the false Dionysius had already made their way westward. Such were sent by pope Paul the First to Pippin in 757 and by Hadrian the First to abbat Fuldrad of Saint Denys some years later: Gfroerer 3. 865.

⁶ Compare a letter of abbat Bene-

CHAP. II.

the required version. How far the expectations of the votaries of saint Denis were satisfied by the work, we do not know. Perhaps the obscurity of the translation limited the number of its readers; at any rate it does not appear to have excited much attention. When Pope Nicholas the First objected to it in 860 or 862 and wrote to Charles the Bald demanding that the philosopher's work should be sent to him for correction, it was really not so much from suspicion of its contents⁷ as a premature attempt to exercise a right of censorship, prompted by hostility, in presence of an angry dispute between the churches, against anything Greek.

But the influence of the books upon the mind of the translator was momentous. The Timaeus of Plato he probably knew through the version of Chalcidius already; but now the bold forgery claiming the name of the Areopagite, which seems to have won currency in the sixth century, though the actual date of its writing may be a little earlier, placed him in possession of a metaphysical system ostensibly founded upon works of Plato which were unknown to western Christendom, and elaborated with a speculative fearlessness equally foreign to its spirit. Another Greek writer, the monothelite monk Maximus, supplemented the Scot's knowledge of the ultimate forms of Neo-Platonism, and from him too he translated a commentary which, like the works of the Areopagite, was destined for the royal study. It should be remarked in passing that John, unlike the men to whom our attention has hitherto been given, addressed himself to a very select company; it

* v. supra,
p. 56, n. 3.

† v. Ritter, geschichte
der christl.
philos. 3. 208
& n. 1, Hamburg 1844.

‡ v. F. C. Baur, die christliche lehre von der drei-einigkeit und menschwerdung Gottes
2. 205, n. 1,
Tuebingen
1842.

dict of Aniane, the councillor of Lewis the Pious, in Baluze, Miscellanea 2. 97 b, ed. Mansi, Lucca 1761 folio.

⁷ What suspicion there was, was probably inferred from the Scot's notoriety in the interval in the controversy about predestination.

might be to the king, whose intellectual sympathies were inherited from his father and grandfather, or it might be to his own hearers in the palace school. Twice only did he emerge into public view, and the estrangement, the public condemnation, which his utterances then on the subject of predestination and of the nature of the eucharist provoked⁸ may have naturally confirmed his previous reserve. Of his further life little certain is recorded. He appears to have been in France in the year of the emperor's death⁹. The following year saw peace reëstablished in England, and it is difficult to resist a tradition which held currency throughout the middle ages that he sought retreat here when his old protector was taken away from him, and that his fervour of teaching was only closed when his scholars fell upon him and slew him. The monument that commemorated the holy sophist was soon destroyed, but repeated orders from pope or council have not suc-

A.D. 877.

v. infra, append. ii.

⁸ His predestination tract was twice condemned by church councils, at Valence in 855 and at Langres some years later. See Huber 97 sq. and the notes. To the former was due the contemptuous description of John's arguments as 'ineptas quaestiuunculas et aniles pene fabulas, Sotorumque pultes' (Scots' porridge): cap. vi. Mansi, Conc. 15. 6D. That John took part in the controversy raised by Paschasius Radbert is certainly to be inferred from the title of the work of Adrevald, De corpore et sanguine Christi contra ineptias Ioannis Scoti, printed in d'Achery, Spicilegium 1. 150 sqq.; ed. 1723. The conclusion is not invalidated but confirmed by the fact that in after years the book of Ratramnus on the subject was attributed to the Scot. It was known that he had written a treatise, and therefore the only appropriate treatise that came to hand was fathered upon him. This obvious argument seems to have escaped nearly all the modern writers who decide the point in the negative. The penetration of von Noorden has further discerned certain peculiarities in the views ascribed by contemporaries to John Scot which are inapplicable to Ratramnus: see his Hinkmar Erzbischof von Rheims 103, n. 2.

⁹ This is inferred from a poem in which John commemorates the foundation of a church dedicated to the virgin, which from several points of correspondence is believed to be that at Compiègne which Charles began in 877 on the model of his grandfather's church at Aix-la-Chapelle. As however the actual building was delayed by the emperor's death John seems to describe not what was really existing but the plan on which it was to be built. See the quotation in Huber 120 n.

CHAP. II. — ceded in obliterating his truest memorial which remains to us in his writings, above all in the great work *On the Division of Nature*¹⁰. From this last we may, without attempting even in outline to portray his whole system, collect enough of its features to shew what a revelation he made of the dignity of the order of the universe; however much it might be mixed with crude or fantastic ideas, however often clouded in obscurity, yet full of suggestion, full of interest everywhere¹¹.

His reflexions upon the subject of predestination led John Scot, as we have already seen, to trace his theory of the nature of sin. Augustin¹² and even Athanasius had been led to a similar explanation of the appearance of evil in the world, but how differently had they applied it. With them it is found compatible with a belief in the eternity of punishment; to John it means that since all things proceed from good, so in good they must all be one day absorbed. To this consummation

¹⁰ Its proper title is Greek, Περὶ φύσεων μερισμοῦ. The editio princeps, which is far better reputed than Schruster's reprint of 1838, was published by Thomas Gale (as appears from the appendix, p. 46), Oxford 1681 folio, whose pages I have added to my references to the work. In writing the present chapter I unfortunately had not access to the best critical edition, that of H. J. Floss, which forms the hundred and twenty-second volume of Migne's Cursus, and includes the rest of the Scot's works, namely (1) the translations of Dionysius and Maximus and the expositions on the former, (2) the tract on predestination, (3) a commentary and homilies on the gospel of saint John, (4) verses, and (5) a fragment on the procession and recession of the soul to God. The catalogue of lost works printed in the Testimonia prefixed to Gale's edition is not very critically compiled; it is corrected with various success by the biographers.

¹¹ The most profound exposition of the Scot's system with which I am acquainted is given by Baur, Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit 2. 263-344. Baur is especially complete in his analysis of John's relation to his Greek predecessors. I am also under obligations to the general works of Ritter 3. 209-296 and Gfroerer 3. 922-937. Of the biographers Huber is the most philosophical, while Dr Christlieb loses himself in far-fetched speculations as to John's affinities to modern philosophy.

¹² Peccatum quidem non per ipsum factum est: et manifestum est, quia peccatum nihil est et nihil sunt homines cum peccant: Tract. i in Joh. evang., Opp. 3 (2) 294 c, ed. Bened., Paris 1689 folio.

he loves to apply the text, *Ero mors tua, O mors; morsus tuus ero, inferne*¹³. 'To find the cause of sin in God's work he pronounces to be blasphemous¹⁴. 'Sin, he repeats, has no cause because it has no real existence. How then does it arise? The answer is given in various forms which converge upon the central thought that sin is implied in the fact of man's free will. He takes the case of two men looking at a golden vase. There is no evil in the vase, but it may excite in the one feelings only of pleasure and admiration, in the other the passion of covetousness. The one receives the simple impression of a beautiful object; the other colours and deforms it by his own lawless desire. But this desire, this evil, is not indigenous to man's nature; it is the result of the irregular action of his reasonable and free will¹⁵. The senses are deceived by that which appears to be good, by false good, and the infection spreads inwardly to the intellect itself. 'Thus the inner man wherein naturally dwelleth truth and all good, which is the word of God, the only-begotten son of God, becomes corrupt and sins. But this process does not originate in evil. The bodily sense does not desire a thing because it is evil but because it has the show of goodness. 'No vice is found but is the shadow of some virtue¹⁶. Pride for instance is a per-

CHA
—
De d
v. 36 p
Lib.
v. 36 f
205 sq.
cf. Au
de lib.
ii. 20 f
opp. 1.
sq.

Lib.
p. 205.

Lib.
p. 38.

¹³ Hosea xiii. 14 in the Vulgate: the Hebrew has an important difference of meaning.

¹⁴ Cf. 'Deus itaque malum nescit; nam si malum sciret, necessario in natura rerum malum esset. Divina siquidem scientia, omnium quae sunt causa est; ... ac per hoc si deus malum sciret, in aliquo substantialiter intelligeretur, et participes boni malum esset, et ex virtute et bonitate vitium et malitia procederent: quod impossibile esse vera edocet ratio,' De divinis. nat. ii. 29

p. 84. See above p. 54 and compare De div. nat. v. 27 p. 259.

¹⁵ Non ergo in natura humana plantatum est malum, sed in perverso et irrationabili motu rationabilis liberaeque voluntatis est constitutum: ib. iv. 16 p. 206, cf. v. 36 p. 287.

¹⁶ He adds 'by some fallacious likeness or contrariety,' giving however of the 'contrariety' the single instance 'as evil to good.' This can only be explained on the assumption that in his first book John was un-

CHAP. II. version of a true sense of power—in good men it takes the form of a love of heavenly excellence and of a contempt of earthly weakness;—and ^a it was from pride that the sin of man began. It was the first exercise of his free will.

^a Lib. v. 25
p. 255.

^o Lib. iv. 20
p. 211.

^p Cap. 15
p. 197.

^q Ibid.; cf.
v. 1 p. 224.

^r Lib. ii. 6, 7
p. 49.

In applying these views to the interpretation of the first chapters of Genesis, our Scot has practically to supersede its historical meaning by the allegorical. He explains any difficulties that he encounters in the narrative by the theory that it is accommodated to our lower understandings. It expresses truth by figures. ^o The order of time for instance, he says, is so often violated in the Bible itself that there can be no objection to our ignoring it in our exposition. ^p Adam must have sinned before he was tempted by the devil; else he would not have been accessible to temptation. The events that are related to have taken place in Eden, that is in the ideal state, really happened on earth and were consequential to Adam's sin. ^q For if paradise is human nature formed after the image of God and made equal to the blessedness of the angels, then immediately he wished to leave his Creator, he fell from the dignity of his nature. His pride began before he consented to his wife. By this act man came into the domain of time and space; ^r hence arose the physical distinctions of sex ¹⁷ and the rest of his bodily conditions, willing to force too many novel thoughts upon the reader. The theory of evil waits for its complete development until the fourth book. As yet he is content to speak of evil in a general way as though it actually existed. The contradictions of the work have certainly, as Dr von Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande, 2. 24, n. 102, 1861, warns us, been exaggerated by critics and seldom fail to resolve themselves on a closer scrutiny.

¹⁷ Baur, 2. 302, considers that the Scot held this separation of sex as 'the most important consequence of the fall.' I am however inclined to think that he chose it as the most speaking example, the simplest way of denoting the material man. Who after Augustin could avoid regarding sex as the distinctive corporeal fact in man's nature? Compare on this principle of Augustin, Milman, Latin Christianity 1. 151.

no less than the diversities of manners and thought that divide the human race. That which was single became manifold. We thus reach the ultimate result of the philosopher's conception of evil. "Sin is contemporaneous with the existence of the human body. 'It marks the transition from the ideal to the actual, from the world of thought to the world of matter.

CHAP. II.

John's skill in fitting this theory within the framework of accepted doctrine cannot disguise its essential contrariety. He supplants the dark dogma of the natural corruption of man, his original destiny to perdition, by the conception of the negative character of evil. "It is he would say with Plato, as little natural as the diseases of the body: it is the inevitable result of the union of flesh and spirit. But the primal dignity of man's nature must in the end réassert its sway. The soul may forget her natural goods, may fail in her striving towards the goal of the inborn virtues of her nature; the natural powers may move, by fault of judgement, towards something which is not their end: but not for ever. For the universal tendency of things is upward; and thus from evil is wont to turn good, but in nowise from good evil. . . The first evil could not be perpetual, but by the necessity of things must reach a certain bound and one day vanish. For if the divine goodness which ever worketh not only in the good but also in the wicked, is eternal and infinite, it follows that its contrary will not be eternal and infinite . . . Evil therefore will have its consummation and remain not in any nature, since in all the divine nature will work and be manifest. Our nature then is not fixed in evil; . . it is ever moving, and seeks nought else but the highest good, from which as from a beginning its motion takes its source, and to which it is hastened as to an end. As all things proceed from God, so in God they find their final completion. He*

Lib. ii. 9,
iv. 10 pp. 51, 181.
† cf. Gfroerer
3. 909.

* De div. nat.
ii. 5 p. 49;
cf. Plat. Tim.
p. 86.

* De div. nat.
v. 26 p. 256.

† Cap. 25
pp. 254 sqq.

CHAP. II. is the end of things, the last of the four forms of nature which make the foundation of the Scot's system.

This fourfold division is absolutely John's own property and discoverable ^aelsewhere only in the Indian doctrine of the Sankhya: 'in the simplicity of his general plan,' it has been truly said, 'he surpasses all the philosophers of the middle ages.' The scheme breaks into two by the distinction of creator and created. The first and fourth forms are the ^btwo aspects of the uncreated unity, according as we consider it as the beginning or as the end of things. The one creates: the other creates not, it is the ^crest for which nature strives and which consists in the restoration of things to their original unity. Between these terms lie the two forms of created things. They have the same division as the other two. The second creates: the third creates not. The one is the world of ideas, the pattern upon which the other, the sensible universe, is made. It contains the abstractions: ^dgoodness—the first of things,—essence, life, wisdom, truth, intellect, reason, virtue, justice, health, greatness, omnipotence, eternity, peace, and all the virtues and reasons which the Father created once for all in his Son, and according to which the order of all things is framed, each considered by itself and apart from sensible objects. These are the primordial causes of things, the ^eeffects of which are manifested in time and place in the third form of nature. But it is impossible to keep the effects apart from the causes; ^fthey are involved in them, and with them eternal, though not eternal as God; for ^geternity, like every other attribute, can only be predicated of him in an improper sense, he is more than eternal. ^hPlace and time exist not with him: he has nothing accidental, cause and effect with him are one. Therefore the

^a H. T. Colebrooke, essays on the relig. and philos. of the Hindus 154, ed. Leipzig 1858.

^b Ritter 3-211; cf. p. 294, n. 1.
^c De div. nat. ii. 2 p. 46.

^e Cf. lib. iii. 10 p. 111.

^d Lib. ii. 36 p. 94.

^e Lib. i. 1, ii. 2 pp. 1, 47.

^f Lib. iii. 5, 6 pp. 105 sq.
^g Lib. i. 16 p. 10.

^h Cap. 23 p. 15.

¹ universe, as his creation, is eternal : there was no time when it was not. It is evident that in the view of this clear-sighted idealist there is no room for the accepted Christian belief, according to which creation is bringing into being in the sense of bringing into the sensible world : but his opinion was perhaps an inevitable deduction from the premises of formal Platonism, and something very like it was ^k maintained by so correct a theologian as saint Anselm. To John Scot thought is the only real being, and, philosophically speaking, ¹ body has no existence except as dependent on thought¹⁸. But he loves to express truth by alternate affirmation and negation, confirmatory when they appear most contradictory to one another; and so he couples with the assertion that there was no time when the universe was not, the contrary assertion that there was a time when it was not. In a sense that transcends intelligence it exists eternally; in another sense ^m it began to be when it passed into the sphere of time and place. The meaning is in strict correspondence with that which we have found in John's theory of evil. Evil arises by the passage from the spiritual to the material : objective creation by the passage from the eternal to the temporal. Good in the one argument, eternity in the other, is the positive element in the universal system; ⁿ matter is the mere concourse of the accidents of being.

CHAP. II.
Lib. iii. 8
p. 107.

^k Monolog.
ix. p. 7 D, E, ed. 2. G. Gerberon., Paris
1721 folio.
¹ De div. nat.
i. 6, 35
pp. 3, 20.

^m Lib. iii. 15
p. 119.

ⁿ Lib. i. 62
p. 34.

¹⁸ It has often been remarked that John has in plain terms the argument of Descartes: 'When I say I understand that I am, I prove that I am, that I can understand that I am, and that I do understand that I am;' Dum ergo dico, Intelligo me esse, nonne in hoc uno verbo, quod est intelligo, tria significo a se inseparabilia? nam et me esse, et posse intelligere me esse, et intelligere me esse, demonstro. Num [Nonne] vides verbo uno et meam ovtiav, meamque virtutem, et actionem significari? De divis. nat. i. 50 p. 27. Saint Augustin's statement of the syllogism, though less clearly expressed, appears to me to be virtually identical with John's; so that the latter will hardly deserve the distinction claimed for it by M Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique i. 183 sq.

CHAP. II.

* Timaeus
89 B.

Such is John Scot's world. To him as to °Plato its goodness is its essential significance: it begins and ends with thought, with pure being, with God. He fills in the outline with a confidence, a certainty, of the truth of his speculations. Yet, as though half conscious of their strangeness to the understanding of his age, he is ever anxious to prove that he is continuing, not breaking off from, the line of thought sanctioned by the greatest of the fathers and by the Bible itself. Authority is still a power with him, but limited, expanded, refined. The

¶ The div. nat.
lv. 14, v. 37
sup. 100 sq.
206.

¶ 1. th. i. 66
p. 37.

¶ 1. th. iii. 30
p. 144.

¶ name of the fathers, of Augustin himself, cannot deter him from forming his own conclusions on any subject.

¶ Even the Bible, though necessarily containing nothing but truth, presents that truth with so much accommodation to the bodily senses that it is the °duty of the philosopher to endeavour to penetrate beneath its metaphors and bring forth the substance that underlies them. For its sense is infinite, because it is the reflection of the divine reason; but reason stands above it, is man's sure guide in interpreting the written message of revelation.

¶ 1. th. i. 66
p. 37.

¶ If the authority be true, neither can contradict the other, since both proceed from the same source, namely from the divine wisdom. To appreciate this rationalistic position we must remember that its object was in no wise to lower the dignity of the Bible, but solely to elevate the conception of the human understanding. Nor was it a new or unheard-of thing. Prolegisus, Alcuin's scholar at York and his successor in the abbacy of Saint Martin at Tours, had made a very similar statement of the relation of the two forces and he had felt it compatible with the most literal view of inspiration¹⁰. Neither he nor the valuable enumeration of the place in Prolegisus' program by Dr Reuter.

¹⁰ The above is an attempt to state the view of Prolegisus in plain English as far as possible.

Scot had any doubt of the irrefragable truth of the Bible. But while Fredegisus found it in the literal sense, John sought for the larger meaning concealed within its depths. ^{CHAP. II.} For the sense of the divine utterances is manifold and infinite, even as in one and the same feather of the peacock we behold a marvellous and beautiful variety of countless colours. Like principles, as one applied them, might lead to a submissive dependence on the letter, or to amplest freedom of rational enquiry. ^{Lib. iv. 5 p. 164.} For in the one, reason without the support of authority is weak, in the other it stands firm fortified by its own virtues, and needs not to be strengthened by any prop of authority. ^{v. Reuter i. 40 sq. De div. nat. i. 71 p. 39.}

If we examine more closely the Scot's view of reason it appears that authority is actually related to it as a species to its genus. In both God reveals not himself but the forms in which we can conceive him. The human reason is the dwelling-place of the word of God. This manifestation, this theophany (John's technical name for God's revelation to man), is cöextensive with the reign of reason and therefore, since reason is everything, it is universally diffused. ^{Lib. iv. 16 p. 205.} It is the cause and substance of all virtues, it is a stream that runs through all nature. ^{Lib. i. 9 p. 5. Lib. iii. 12, 18 pp. 117, 126. Cap. 4 pp. 103 sq.} Intellect . . . and the rest of things that are said to be, are theophanies, and in theophany really subsist; therefore God is everything that truly is, since he makes all things and is made in all things. The pantheism of the last sentence must be interpreted by John's view of God as apart from nature, a view as important in his system as that of revelation. It is impossible for any one who ^{Cf. Ritter 3. 242, 286.} fairly weighs his opinions on this subject not to feel that the judgement of his pantheism has been premature and

Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung im Mittelalter i. 274 n. 21: 'primum ratione, in quantum homi-

nis ratio patitur, deinde auctoritate, non qualibet sed rationali (edit. ratione) duntaxat.'

CHAP. II. warranted only by one set of statements, contradicted and at the same time justified by another set no less necessary to his complete understanding. If the reconciliation appear paradoxical we have but to remember that paradox in the philosopher's view is inevitable when we attempt to conceive the eternal.

The statement that God is everything stands in juxtaposition to the statement that God is the supreme unity. The one bears relation to the world, the other to God himself. The latter is therefore the only strict mode of expression. The central thought of John Scot's system is that God's being is absolute, it cannot be described by any of the categories to which creation is

^d De div. nat.
i. 17 p. 12.

subject; for he transcends them all. ^d We cannot without a misuse of language affirm of him essence, quantity or quality, relation, position or habit, place or time, action or passion. For to affirm these or any of these of God is to limit the illimitable: they are only applicable by way of accommodation to our earthly understanding,

* Capp. 69,
75 pp. 38 sq.,
42; cf. Reuter
1. 60 sq.

^f De div. nat.
i. 18 p. 13.

they have a literal meaning to the simple, ^eto the philosopher they are figures of speech. The rule is stated universally, and can admit no exception ^feven in the theological relation of Father and Son. His honesty forbade our philosopher to ignore a difficult consequence of his position, even when it seemed to oppose a cardinal

^g Capp. 14, 18
pp. 8 sq., 13.

point of piety. ^gHe is indeed reluctant to dwell upon the subject, but not from any mistrust of his own conclusions. The truth lay, he felt, in a double form: we can only express our thoughts about God by contradic-

^h Capp. 14,
16, 78 pp. 9,
12, 44; cf.
Baur, lehre von der Drei-einigkeit,
2. 274 sqq.

ⁱ De div. nat.
i. 14 p. 8.

tions; ^hwe affirm and deny the same things of him, and so aim at a higher harmony in which the contradictions of our human understanding are reconciled. For the mystery of the divine Trinity ⁱpasses the endeavours of human reason and even the purest understandings of celestial essences. We infer from the essence of the things that are, that it exists; from the wonderful order of things, that it is wise; from their motion, that it is life. Yet, saith saint Dionysius the Areopagite, The highest and causal essence of all things cannot be signified by any signification of words or names, or of any articulate voice. For it is neither unity nor trinity, such as can be contemplated by the purest human, by the clearest angelical, understanding ²⁰. . . Chiefly for the sake of those who demand a reason for the Christian faith . . . have these symbolical words been religiously discovered and handed down by the holy theologians . . . Beholding, in so far as they were enlightened by the divine spirit, the one unspeakable cause of all things, and the one beginning, simple and undivided and universal, they called it Unity; but seeing this unity not in singleness or barrenness, but in a marvellous and fertile multiplicity, they have understood three substances of unity.

John Scot traces this trinity in unity in the nature of the universe,—^kin the Creator, the idea, and the fact of ^k Lib. ii. 23 p. 70. things; in another aspect, in οὐσία, δύναμις, and ἐνέργεια,—and in its final resolution into unity. He traces also its reflection in man, ^lin reason, understanding, and sense. ^l Lib. iii. 20 p. 128. For ^mman is the summing up of nature: ⁿhe has both a ^m Lib. ii. 9 p. 51. heavenly being and a sensible being, ^ocombines the ⁿ Lib. iv. 7 p. 171. highest and the lowest elements. He is the meeting-^o Lib. ii. 5 p. 49. point between creation and Creator, and this meeting is summed up in the two-fold nature of Christ. As all nature is contained in man, so all humanity is contained in the Word of God ²¹. When we speak of its incarnation,

²⁰ He repeats this almost in the same words in lib. ii. 35 p. 93, adding 'quaecunque de simplicissimae bonitatis trinitate dicuntur seu cogitantur seu intelliguntur, vestigia quaedam sunt atque theophaniae veritatis.'

²¹ Christ therefore united all the elements of humanity, of creation: he was not 'vir' but 'homo.' It is

CHAP. II. we do not mean an individual, historical fact, but ^p the eternal connexion of the ideal and real. Cause and effect, as has already appeared, cannot be separated in God; they are implied in his single creative will. This

^p v. Baur
2. 307 sqq.

^q De div. nat.
v. 25 p. 252.

^r Ibid. p. 253.

union is revealed in the incarnation, by which ^q the Word of God passed from the region of cause to that of effects, from the world of thought to the world of being. It was not a temporal act, but the expression of the necessary reciprocity of temporal and eternal, the immanent relation of God and the world. It is the supreme theophany. ^rBy it the light to which no man can approach opened access to every intellectual and reasonable creature . . . In it the visible things and the invisible, that is to say, the world of sense and of thought, were restored and recalled to unspeakable unity, now in hope, hereafter in fact; now in faith, hereafter in sight; now in theory, hereafter in practice; now in the individual man who receives the truth, hereafter in all men without distinction.

This restoration of the world is the great subject of the Scot's fifth book. The fourth division of nature is its return to primal unity. The body of man is restored to its elements; these elements coalesce in the resurrection into a new body; and this turns to spirit, the spirit to its original causes, the causes to God. ^s*For God shall be all things in all things, when there shall be nothing but God alone.* Is this restoration asserted of man alone or also of his brother animals? of the good or also of the evil? finally, of the individual or only of the race? To these three questions John has his answer. The first gives him no difficulty. Immortality holds good not only of man, but of the whole animated creation. He

^s Cap. 8
p. 232.

interesting to notice this early appearance of a thought the full recognition of which was reserved for a great preacher of the present century: F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 2nd ser., nr xix.

will conclude this on a priori grounds: the lower animals have their 'natural virtues'²²; they have souls, albeit irrational. But the decisive argument is that man is simply a species of the animal kingdom, and that if the genus perish, the species must perish with it. The immortality of man is the warrant for the immortality of the whole creation. All nature will return to its first causes. CHAP. II.

The question about the survival of evil is more embarrassing, and it cannot be concealed that the Scot does in some places seem to affirm something like a relique of the doctrine of eternal damnation. But in the first place this doctrine is much less plainly declared in the books of The Division of Nature than in the treatise On Predestination; and the latter is an occasional work, written for a special purpose and hampered by its conditions; the former is the representative book of the philosopher's life. In the second place, when a man makes use of conventional language and also of expressions entirely opposed to it and strikingly original, we cannot hesitate as to which is the genuine utterance of his own opinion: and 'the declaration that eternal torment is totally incompatible with the truth that the whole world is set free by the incarnation of the divine Word, is made in distinct terms and closely interwoven with the fabric of John Scot's reasoning. An eternity of suffering and evil is irreconcilable with an eternity of goodness and life and blessedness. There is no room for it in his system. He files away its edges and rounds off its corners until its orthodox shape has disappeared. "First he denounces the 'irrational' folly of trying to combine a material hell with a spiritual exist-

²² Cap. 27
pp. 257 & 260.

²³ Capp. 28,
29, 31 pp.
264 sq., 272.

²² See the curious instances of the memory and the chastity of animals, and of the piety of storks, lib. iii. 41 p. 158.

CHAP. II.

ence: the punishment of the wicked must stand solely in their memory of past wrong. New evil cannot arise then; they will be pained by the phantasies of their old misdeeds. But, proceeds John, though they be deprived of blessedness, something will yet remain to them: ^athe 'natural goods' in which they were created cannot be taken away. Doubtless all gifts are made in proportion to man's capacity of receiving; but the philosopher is sure that this capacity can and will grow and develop until evil is all swallowed up in good. ^yThere may be degrees and stages in happiness, in the progress toward perfection; but there is a certainty of the final victory of good. If it be otherwise, if there be a material world of torments, ^z*then have we laboured in vain, and the sentences of the holy writers which we have alleged will be turned into derision: which God forbid.*

^a Cap. 38
p. 310.

^y Cap. 23
p. 248.

^z Cap. 28
p. 265.

The third question involved in John Scot's view of the return of creation into the Creator concerns the immortality of the individual. He answers it by analogies. ^aThe air is still air though it appear to be absorbed into the light of the sun and to be all light. The voice of man, or of pipe or lyre, loses not its quality when several by just proportion make one harmony in unity among themselves. Nor is it reasonable to suppose that man will subsist in a spiritual state without a body. ^bThe body of our present humanity will disappear, but it will be exchanged for the spiritual body inseparable from the idea of man, the body which he had before he entered into the world of matter. ^cThe whole man is eternal. This therefore is the end of all things visible and invisible, when all visible things pass into the intellectual, and the intellectual into God, by a marvellous and unspeakable union; but not, as we have often said, by any confusion or

^a Cap. 8
p. 234.

^b Cap. 13
pp. 236 sq.

^c Cap. 20
p. 242.

destruction of essences or substances. It is here, in the profoundest and the most original part of his scheme, that the Scot shows most evidently how impossible it would be for him to rest in a purely pantheistic belief. His nature forced him to hold that those virtues, that will, which make man the image of God upon earth, those qualities which exalt one man above his fellows, will not become perfect by 'remerging in the general soul.' Perfection implies their survival 'unconfounded and undestroyed.'

His entire conception of the recovery of all things, of a unity into which the trinity of nature is resolved, is certainly the most original feature in the system of the Irish thinker. In classifying theology on a philosophical basis he achieved a greater discovery than he was perhaps conscious of. He discovered that the doctrine of the church was not stationary but progressive; it was susceptible of development, of indefinite expansion. He discovered in Christianity the germs of all truth. Not only the idea of Christ but all those understood in dogmatic Christianity he applied and enlarged in such a manner that the result was rather a philosophy of religion, than a philosophy of Christianity: and thus to theology he contributed little that it could accept; to philosophy he added not a few of the salient ideas which we connect with the modern schools of metaphysics. His own views were doubtless buried with his writings: they were found out afresh by other men before their publication proved how they had been anticipated. Essentially his system would suffer little if we deducted from it all those Christian elements upon which he supposed it rested; we should find a philosophy in which the idea of God, the idea of evil, and many of its central features, resemble in a remarkable way the thoughts of Spinoza. Yet it would be as dishonest to regard these Christian elements as adventitious, as it would be to ignore the Hebrew antecedents of the great Dutch philosopher. They were necessary to the Scot because he lived in a tradition of Christian theology, because this was the framework in which his thoughts were trained to move and from which he could not wholly free himself. Nevertheless he advanced so far in the direction of giving new meanings to old phrases that he was, speaking generally, unintelligible to his age.

CHAP. II.

At the same time the fact of his appearance in the ninth century, the fact of his apparently unbroken favour at the imperial court, is a remarkable evidence of the liberal spirit which remained with the successors of Charles the Great. It is not as though John was kept at the royal school, just as a miracle of learning, in ignorance of what he actually taught. On the contrary, Charles the Bald had received from his mother the empress Judith, the friend of the Jews, the double elements of a complete education, wide learning and the scholar's instinct of openness to conviction. He was not a mere patron of scholars, he was their friend to whom they deferred on difficult points²³; he loved to enter into disputation with them, laid down theses and invited them to discuss them without reserve. ^dAs CHAP. II. emperor he wished to appear a loyal son of the catholic ^dCf. Reuter I. 48 sqq. church, but he refused to condemn opinions unless they were plainly shown to be hostile to it, and he was generally discreet enough to hesitate about the proof and to hold his judgement free. The keenness of his intelligence conspired with a natural elasticity of temper to produce in his political action what certainly degenerated into an habitual irresolution and infirmity of purpose. But the vices of a statesman are often virtues in private life, and in this view Charles's indecision bears the character of a judicial tolerance, a tolerance to which his continued intercourse with John the Scot is a speaking witness; although it would be unsafe to infer from the scanty notices we have of their relation, that he shared with the philosopher more than a general sympathy with his spirit of free enquiry.

²³ Heric of Auxerre's epistle dedicatory to the emperor, prefixed to his Life of saint Germanus of Auxerre, shows us, in however exaggerated terms, what contemporaries thought of Charles as a patron of learning. Part of it is well-known (cf. supra p. 22), but a larger extract will not come amiss here: Id vobis singulare studium effecistis, ut sicubi terrarum magistri florent artium,

quarum principalem operam philosophia pollicetur, hoc ad publicam eruditionem undecumque vestra celsitudo conduceret, comitas attraheret, dapsilitas provocaret. Luget hoc Graecia, novis invidiae aculeis lacerata, quam sui quondam incolae iam dudum cum Asianis opibus aspernantur, vestra potius magnanimitate delectati, studiis allecti, liberalitate confisi: dolet, inquam,

John certainly had ^edisciples, but they cannot have been numerous. Among near contemporaries ^fHeric of Auxerre, and his pupil, saint Remigius, both teachers of great repute, may be proved to have been indebted for more than they cared to acknowledge, to the materials provided them in the works of the Scot. But in the dark age that followed, those writings seem to have been almost unknown. Early in the tenth century, indeed, we meet with an ^gextract from a poem apparently of John's composition, and a passage from the Division of Nature is cited in a theological treatise written

^e Gfroerer 3. 873, Huber 50.
^f See Hauréau, hist. 1. 182-193, 201-204; & in the not. et extr. des manusc. 20 (2) 5-20; 1862 quarto.

^g Invectiva in Romam, E. Duemmler, Auxilius und Vulgarius 46 n.; 1866.

se olim singulariter mirabilem ac mirabiliter singularem a suis destitui: dolet certe sua illa privilegia (quod numquam hactenus verita est) ad climata nostra transferri. Quid Hiberniam memorem, contempto pelagi discrimine, pene totam cum grege philosophorum ad littora nostra migrantem? Quorum quisquis peritior est ultro sibi indicit exilium; ut Salomoni sapientissimo famuletur ad votum: Actt. SS. mens. Iul. 7. 221 F sq., Antwerp 1731 folio. An admirable characterisation of the emperor is given by von Noorden, Hinkmar 116 sqq.

CHAP. II. a little later²⁴; but in neither case is the source of the quotation indicated. Then, again, when the Scot's book On the Body and Blood of Christ obtained a sudden notoriety in the dispute raised by Berengar of Tours on the nature of the sacrament, the importance attached to his authority by the opponent of transubstantiation is valuable as evidence of the power that his name still possessed; but it is nearly certain that the ^hwork to which Berengar appealed, and which was burnt by the council of Vercelli, was the production not of John but of his contemporary the monk Ratramnus. A solitary trace of John's influence may be found in the fact that, probably through some ⁱglosses of his, the Satyricon of Martianus Capella soon came to take once more that recognised place in the schools which it had held centuries earlier in the dark days of ^kGregory of Tours; but the acceptance of this meagre compendium only shows how incapable his heirs were of appreciating the treasure he had left them in his own works²⁵.

On the other hand, John has been rightly claimed as in some sense the author of the scholastic debate of the earlier part of the middle ages. The precise nature of this influence will be noticed in a future page: here it

²⁴ In the tract De corpore et sanguine domini commonly ascribed to Gerbert. See Carl von Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande 2. 57 n. 227; 1861: cf. Huber 434. Neither of these writers adverts to the suspicion, to say the least, which hangs over the authorship of the book. We shall hereafter (p. 89 n. 11) see reason for ascribing it to Heriger of Lobbes.

²⁵ Previously the book—a grotesque and tasteless allegory descriptive of the seven liberal arts—had been apparently the exclusive possession of the Irish: cf. Haddan,

Remains 273 sq., 280. In Alcuin the very name does not occur, and Mr Mullinger, pp. 64 sqq., 111, 118, has elaborated a theory of this writer's studied hostility to Capella. Had however such a motive existed I feel confident that it would have appeared somewhere in Alcuin's writings. His silence has much rather the look of ignorance. Nor can it be said that the work was only read 'wherever pious scruples did not prevent' (p. 65), in face of abundant instances of its use from saint Remigius to John of Salisbury.

^h Cf. supra, p. 59 n. 8.

A.D. 1050.

ⁱ Cf. Hauréau, not. et extr., ubi supra.

^k Mullinger, schools of Charles the Great 35, 65.

needs only be said that John was the first writer in the west who had systematically adopted a regular syllogistic form of argumentation, and that he was continually reproached with this peculiarity by antagonists such as Prudentius of Troyes. Forgotten for a while, the tradition should seem to have somehow revived, possibly through the studies of Roscelin, and by such an one to have been applied to trains of reasoning widely diverse from anything suspected by John the Scot. On one side he is reputed the father of nominalism, on the other he is thought to have exerted no slight influence on the theological speculations of Gilbert de la Porrée. When, further, we observe that ¹ the Division of Nature was associated in ¹ Huber the condemnation of the heresy of Amalric of Bène²⁶, and ^{A.D. 120} that it was this work which called forth a ^m bull of Honorius the Third in 1225, enjoining a strict search for all copies of the book or of any parts of it, and ordering them to be sent to Rome to be solemnly burnt,—any one who knowingly kept back a copy being declared obnoxious to the sentence of excommunication and the brand of heretical depravity,—we shall be able to form some estimate of the variety and the intensity of danger which was subsequently discovered in the teaching of the Scot.

That such a judgement was warranted by the principles of correct catholic opinion will hardly be denied; but we must not omit to place beside it the fact that there was also literary tradition respecting John, so soon as his memory had been recalled to notice, of a gentler and more appreciative character. His translation of Dionysius was not only widely read, as we know from the numerous manuscripts of it that exist, but also commented on by a man of the saintly reputation of Hugh in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres 26 (2) 470-477; 1870.

²⁶ For proof of this see especially Charles Jourdain's examination of the evidence of Martinus Polonus,

CHAP. II.

• Hist. of
Lat. Chr.
4. 334.

• Gest. pontif. v. 240
p. 393, ed.
Hamilton.

of Saint Victor, not to mention many others; and it is possible, as ^a Milman supposes, that it contributed not a little to the growth of Christian mythology. William of Malmesbury, who was singularly well informed about John and his works, has a good word to say even of the Division of Nature, which he describes as ^o very useful for solving the difficulty of certain questions, albeit he have to be pardoned for some matters wherein, holding his eyes fast upon the Greeks, he has deflected from the path of the Latins. The acuteness of this criticism enhances the value of William's opinion; he was well aware that John had been deemed a heretic, and he freely confessed that there are truly very many things in his book, the which, unless we carefully examine them, appear abhorrent from the faith of the catholics. This temperate judgement is repeated by the most popular of the encyclopaedists of the middle ages, Vincent of Beauvais. There is also evidence that the name of John the Scot was known and honoured not only at Malmesbury but also in that Saxon monastery of Corvey which preserved its Carolingian culture longer perhaps than any other: so late as the middle of the twelfth century, its abbat, Wibald, writing to Manegold of Paderborn, commemorates the philosopher as closing the line of great masters of the age which began with Bede the Venerable, and went on with Haimon of Halberstadt and Rabanus Maurus,—men most learned, who by writing and reasoning left in the church of God illustrious monuments of their genius ²⁷.

²⁷ Quid loquar de caeteris viris doctissimis qui post predictos in aeclesia dei scribendo et disserendo preclara ingenii sui monimenta reliquerunt! Bedam, dico, et Ambrosium Aupertum, Heimonem, Rabanum, Iohannem Scottum, et multos preterea, quorum opera legimus; nec non illos quos vidimus, Ansel-mum Laudunensem, Wilhelmum Parisiensem, Albricum Remensem, Hugonem Parisiensem, et alios plurimos, quorum doctrina et scriptis mundus impletus est: Epist. clxvii, in Jaffé, Biblioth. i. 278; 1864. See other instances in Hauréau, Hist. 2 (1) 59; 1880.

CHAPTER III.

THE DARK AGE.

If the attempt of John the Scot to change Christianity CHAP. III.
into a philosophy failed to make an impression upon the succeeding age, it is the less surprising when we consider that he failed in company with all the wise men of the ninth century. Their religious and their philosophical aims were alike forgotten, the practices and beliefs they combated won a gradual acceptance. In the interval between the decline of the Carolingian house and the reformation of the eleventh century, Christendom sank into a grosser view of religion, into an abasement of morals that pervaded the church equally with the laity, into an ignorance all but universal. In this Dark Age, as it is well distinguished, it is a thankless task to seek for the elements of enlightenment of which the vestiges are so scanty. Their existence, however, is proved by the life they manifested as soon as the spirit of religion was reawakened. It was the divorce between religion and learning, between religion and morality, that signalised the time; a divorce that, just as in the seventh century, was conditioned by the helpless confusion of the external order, its effect in turn reacting upon itself.

Yet to speak of the age as consciously reverting to paganism¹, is to misread its character. When the church

¹ This is a conclusion which vitiates much of Dr Reuter's view of the period, Geschichte der religiösen

Aufklärung 1. 67-78: to his references however I am frequently indebted.

CHAP. III. surrendered her charge of intellectual things, she assimilated herself no doubt to the returning barbarism of the civil state; and in this process she absorbed a variety of pagan elements which came to be identified with the essence of her religion, and from which her rebellious children in the sixteenth century were by no means able entirely to liberate themselves. The service of God was merged in ceremonial on the one hand, in superstition on the other. Even those men who had the wish to uphold the principles which the nobler minds of the ninth century had professed, had not the strength to carry them out consistently. Ratherius, bishop of Verona, a good example of the cultivated churchman of his day and a sturdy enemy of the worldliness and profligacy of his contemporaries, repeats the declamations of saint Agobard against magic. He denounces the credulous spirit of those who assume its efficacy, and yet he himself ^arecommends for some ailment a remedy of an entirely superstitious nature. He has a just contempt of the fashion in which fasts, penances, and pilgrimages were undertaken, and a very slight opinion of their value at all unless controlled by a high spiritual motive: yet his protests against materialistic views of religion are compatible with so hearty an adhesion to the doctrine of transubstantiation that ^bthe treatise of Paschasius Radbert, which first formulated it, was often ascribed to him.

^a A. Vogel, Ratherius von Verona i. 69, Jena 1854.

^b Ibid. i. 234 sqq., 2. 180 sqq.

Religion was fast subsiding into mere superstition or into its kindred opposite, materialism. The claims to mysterious powers was the means by which the clergy were enabled to maintain their hold upon the people. Insensibly they were enveloped in the same shadow, and A.D. 939. we have actually evidence of a body of Christian priests in the diocese of Vicenza who worshipped a God with eyes and ears and hands; they were branded as a distinct order of heretics, anthropomorphites: such was the result of the popular and authorised image-worship. Nor was it only in the ceremonial of the church or in the medley of Christian and heathen manners and thoughts that the collapse of religion made itself felt. Ambitious churchmen found their only opening, now that the ambition of Christian learning was forgotten, in the service of the secular state, where they were the more indispensable, since in the north, at least, they formed the only class that received any sort of mental culture. But it is one of the contrasts between the northern and southern civilisations that while in the former what schools there were, existed solely for the clergy and did not travel beyond their meagre professional requirements, in Italy the utter degradation of the church and papacy (the more felt because near at hand) produced so general a contempt for their ordinances and prescriptions that educated men turned away from theology to the more tangible interest of classical learning.

The candidates for ecclesiastical orders here mixed with the sons of nobles at ^dschools which were established and conducted, more often than otherwise by lay philosophers, for the exclusive purpose of teaching grammar, and which to the stricter churchman appeared directly pagan in their bias. One of these teachers, Anselm of Bisate, ^ecomplains that he was shunned as a demoniac, almost as a heretic; and Anselm, the Peripatetic as he styles himself, is a good, if late, specimen of his class. He was a highly connected Milanese clergyman, a travelled man too, who had visited Mentz and Bamberg. The Rhetorimachia, which he wrote between the years 1049 and 1056,

CHAP. III.

^c Rather, serm. i. de quadrag. xxix. sqq., in d'Achery's spicilegium x. 388 b sqq., ed. 1723.

^d See von Giesebrecht, de litt. stud. ap. Ital. 12-19: cf. Vogel x. 40 sq.

^e Epist. ad Drogon., Duemmler, Anselm der Peripat. 19, Halle 1872.

CHAP. III. and dedicated to the emperor Henry the Third, is a masterpiece of laborious futility. How little the pedant's vein was in keeping with catholic notions may be learned from a vision which he relates that he once saw.

[†] Rhetorim.
ii., ibid.
pp. 39-40.

[†] The saints and the muses, he tells us, struggled for his possession, and he was in the greatest perplexity to which side he should ally himself, for so noble, so sweet, were both companies that I could not choose either of them; so that, were it possible, I had rather both than either.

Under such training as Anselm's, the future clergy of Italy gave themselves up to their humanistic studies with an enthusiasm which the theology of the day was impotent to excite in them. There are even a few symptoms of a declared hostility to Christianity. One Vilgard of Ravenna is said to have revered Virgil, Horace, and Juvenal as infallible authorities²; but we cannot draw too broad an inference from this assertion in an age which, we know from the example of [§] Ratherius, was apt to consider the canons of the church and the forged decretals of Isidore as equally with the Bible and the fathers, the *discipline of God*³. The patriotism of the Italian seduced him into a blunder possibly less mischievous than that which approved itself to the orthodoxy of the German. There was a mysterious sanction inherent in written documents which it did not occur to them to criticise or distinguish.

[§] De contemptu canonum i. d'Achery, spicil. t. 351 a.

In the same way, if any of these scholastics chanced to engage in the controversies of the church, he was inevitably entangled in a motley confusion of sacred and ² See the somewhat fabulous account of Rodolph Glaber, Hist. ii. 12 in Bouquet 10. 23, 1760.

³ Compare the Discordia inter Ratherium et clericos: Quod vero scriptum invenitur in lege Moysis et prophetis et psalmis, quod in evangelio, actibus et praedicationibus apostolorum, decretalibus pontificum et constitutionibus canonum, non rursum a deo tibi elucet inspiratum: d'Achery 1. 364 a.

profane. ^b Eugenius Vulgarius exhausts his classical vocabulary, in language recalling the most servile rhetoric of the brazen age of the empire, to express the ⁱ divinity of that pope whose pontificate is marked by the deepest ruin of order, the vilest abandonment of decency, that even Rome ever witnessed. Yet he dismisses the claims of the apostolic see with a confidence worthy of Claudius of Turin or of a modern protestant, and maintains that a man can only obtain the authority of saint Peter by deserving it ⁴. The contradiction would be inconceivable but for the mixture of heterogeneous ideas which marks the barbarism of the age. The church refused to be taught, and suffered accordingly. The clergy who were educated in the Italian rhetorical schools formed the purely secular portion of their order, and led it into more grievous disrepute. If the training of the scholastic was associated with the function of the clerical politician, the union was but external: by the assumption of literary arms the church as a religious body lost more than it gained.

It is moreover significant that the schools of Italy preserved a tradition of Roman law possibly uninterrupted from ancient times. ^k The special law-school of Pavia dates from the tenth century, and early in the eleventh the study of law is spoken of in a way that gives the impression of its being a long-established

CHAP. III.

^b Duemmler, Auxilius und Vulgarius, 44 sqq.ⁱ See his letter to Sergius III, Duemmler 143 sq.

⁴ Debuerat certe erubesci homo velle deo tollere quod suum est. Pater enim omne iudicium dedisse filio dicitur, non Romae: neque filius dixit, Tu es Roma et super hanc Romam aedificabo ecclesiam meam, sed Tu es Petrus et super hanc petram; non dixit Petrum sed petram, intelligi volens eius fidei et confessionis soliditatem aedificare et firmare immeritorum subsequa-

*cium consimilem, non quidem sequacium sine merito: alioquin non est sequax Petri, si non habeat meritum illius Petri. Quid igitur? ostende mihi fidem sine operibus, et ego ostendam tibi sequacem Petri sine merito illius Petri... Num dicendum est profuisse summis sacerdotibus super cathedram Moysis sedisse? &c. De causa Formosiana xi, Duemmler, Aux. und Vulg. 130.*

^k See Giesebrecht, gesch. d. deutschen kaiserzeit 1. 358, 4th ed., Brunswick 1873.

CHAP. III.

institution in the ordinary schools. Milo Crispin records that Lanfranc, the famous archbishop of Canterbury,

¹ Vit. Lanfr. v. § 11 Migne 150. 39 A; 1854.

² F. C. von Savigny, gesch. d. röm. rechts im mittelalter 2. 119, 224 sqq., Heidelberg 1816; Vogel 1. 41; cf. Prantl, gesch. d. logik. 2. 69.

¹ was trained from boyhood in the schools of liberal arts and civil law, after the custom of his country;—in scholis liberalium artium et legum saecularium ad suae morem patriae. ² Other circumstances too make it highly probable that law formed a regular subject of instruction in many schools from a much earlier period. It would obviously engage the attention of those churchmen who promised themselves a future of political activity. The principles of Roman law would combine themselves with their theological ideas, and it is difficult not to trace in this connexion one of the opportunities through which, in the judgement of competent lawyers, ² the phraseology and argumentary methods of the old jurisprudence were enabled to penetrate the theology of western Christendom.

² See sir H. J. S. Maine, ancient law 354-364, 5th ed., 1874.

In the north, as we have said, the state of the clergy was different⁵. They had their professional colleges in the schools attached to the greater monasteries and cathedrals. But these, even if a few, especially in Lotharingia, retained something of their vital force, had long lost their popularity and become appropriated to a class. The slender tradition of learning and thought lay hidden in their libraries rather than shone forth in the mechanical instruction of their teachers. The rare pupils who sought for knowledge were left, as we may learn from the experience of ^o bishop Ratherius, to discover it by

^o Vogel 1. 24.

⁵ There is a curious and ancient gloss in the margin of the codex containing Gerbert's treatise De rationali et ratione uti, itself nearly contemporary with the author, which deserves quotation. 'Italia,' it runs, 'fertilis in ferendis est frugibus, Gallia et Germania nobilis in nutriendis militibus. Nesciunt Itali quid sapiunt Galli. Itali denarios cumulant, Galli sapientiam corradunt'; Pez, Thesaurus Anecdotorum novissimus 1 (2) 151 mg., Augsburg 1721 folio. Is this the criticism of a French scribe?

their own labour. The pursuit of the few was looked on CHAP. III.
 with suspicious jealousy by the many, and the most tentative steps towards enlarging the compass of education were mistrusted as though they had been directed against religion. An excellent illustration of this attitude of mind is afforded by the history of Brun the Saxon, † 905.
 better known by the time-honoured name of saint Bruno.
 His brother, Otto the Great, was never more consciously the successor of the great Charles and the second founder of the medieval empire, than when he set himself to organize a body of ministers specially educated for the duties of government. The chancellorship had by this time become a mere titular appendage to the archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, Treves, and Salzburg, whose work was done by the royal chancery or chapel, the staff of clergymen of the household. It was of the first importance not only to train them into efficiency but also to bring up a new generation of administrators qualified to manage the affairs of what was soon to be an empire.
 This task Otto entrusted to the young abbat Bruno⁶, who wisely recognised the necessity of promoting the widest learning attainable. It is an interesting circumstance that now, as in the first foundation of the Palace School by Charles, it was to the British islands that the German looked for help; and Israel, a Scottish bishop⁷, was called from his cloister at Treves to teach Greek, a study to which Bruno had already been introduced by the Byzantine legates at the court. The coöperation of ⁶ The historical position of the saint is sketched in masterly outline by von Giesebrecht, I. 321-331: see also Vogel I. 154-173.

⁷ Ruotger calls him episcopus Scotigena, Vit. Brunon. vii, Pertz 4. 257; 1841. Flodoard, a. 947, ib.

3. 394 (1839) and Richer, Hist. ii. 66, ib. 602, say simply Britto or Brittigena: he was no doubt an Irishman. Haddan calls him, I know not on what authority, bishop of Verden: Remains 286.

CHAP. III. the Celt is recognised by ^pmodern historians as of ^p Giesebrecht singular and indispensable importance.

I. 325 sqq.

Bruno's learned ardour and the pains he took to secure the fittest masters and to collect the choicest classical manuscripts that could be found in Italy, are celebrated with wondering admiration by his biographers⁸. ^q*He restored the long ruined fabric of the seven liberal arts; history, rhetoric, poetry, philosophy, especially the more mysterious problems of metaphysics, were the subjects he loved to discuss with the doctors whom he brought together. He joined in the disputations, ready to give counsel, readier to receive it; he would always rather himself be a learner than a teacher. A man of his receptive nature was sure to exercise a personal attraction over those around him, and the power which Bruno possessed he used with the single purpose of leading them through learning to a wisdom that should raise them into another world than that gross and corrupt society in which they lived. His own example, much like king Alfred's, was a model of the union of a scholar and a statesman. Himself continually occupied with every sort of official business he always reserved his early morning hours for study. He withdrew from the noisy mirth of the supper-table to find relief in his books, his energies apparently freshened by the labours of the day. Wherever he went he carried about his library with him ^ras it had been the ark of the Lord.*

^r Ibid.,
cap. viii.

Yet the age which gloried in the character of archbishop Bruno, could only find in that love of learning which was his special virtue, a reason for doubting

⁸ Non sufficit ei in gazophilatium cordis sui colligere quod in promptu habebat; peregrina insuper conduxit aenigmata, et quicquid phylosophicum terrenisque sensibus remotissimum sensit, hoc undecumque contraxit: Ruotger v. p. 257.

whether he were really the saint men called him. The difficulty was resolved in a legend that soon won currency. A certain Poppo, says Thietmar, "fell into a trance and was led to an high mountain, whereon he beheld a great city with beautiful buildings: then approaching a lofty tower he climbed its steep ascent and upon its spacious top deserved to behold Christ seated with all his saints. There was Bruno archbishop of Cologne, being accused by the supreme Judge for his vain pursuit of philosophy: howbeit saint Paul was his advocate and he was restored to his throne. To us looking back at Bruno's work, it is difficult to exaggerate its value whether to his nation or to the church at large. Under his guidance the royal palace became the centre also of intellectual life in Germany. Bruno's aim was to fit the clergy to spread this new civilisation over the country, and when they separated to higher offices afterwards, as when he himself was removed to the see of Cologne, to form each one a fresh centre of learning. In this way he seconded the measures which the wisdom of his father and brother, Henry and Otto, had directed to the revival of the political state. The example was taken up by the religious houses, and their schools—those of Reichenau and Saint Gall are particularly distinguished—entered upon a new course of learned activity. The clergy of Germany became marked out from the rest of Christendom no less by their education than by its fruit, their moral excellence⁹. To such seed the German popes owed their distinction, and through them the restoration of the papacy signalised by Leo the Ninth and Gregory the Seventh was made practicable.

CHAP. III.

⁹ Chron. ii. 10
Pertz 3. 748.

A. D. 953.

⁹ This is recognised by bishop Arnulf of Orleans in his famous speech before the council of Saint Basol near Rheims in the year 991:

'In Belgica et Germania... summos sacerdotes dei religione admodum praestantes inveniri,' Act. conc. Rem. xxviii, Pertz 3. 673.

CHAP. III.

¹ De corp. et sang. Chr. verit. i. Max.
bibl. patr. 18.
441 B: cf. Gozechin. scho-
last. epist. ad Valcher., Mabillon. vet.
anal. 437-446,
ed. 1723.

It was long before the intellectual revival which began to show itself from the middle of the tenth century, was sensibly felt. Guitmund, archbishop of Aversa, speaking of the time when Fulbert, who died in 1029, came to govern the school of Chartres, which he made the chief home of learning in Gaul, confesses that at that time the liberal arts had all but become extinct in the land. A single name illuminates the literary record of the age, and Gerbert of Aurillac, pope Sylvester the Second, owes his unique position far less to his writings than to his personal influence as a teacher; as a teacher too not of moral but of natural philosophy, as a master not of theology but of statecraft. The stores of his knowledge,—were they borrowed, according to a now discredited tradition, from the Arabic learning of the Spanish march, or won by long practice and research in every library accessible to him,—were no doubt unequalled. Gerbert was a mathematician, a natural philosopher, and a pioneer of natural philosophers; his learning was believed to be universal: but, except in the domain of positive science, he was but the ready accumulator and diffuser of what was actually within the range of any well-read student of his day. In theology and metaphysics he produced little or nothing. If we exclude the necessary official productions of a dignitary of the church, sermons and speeches addressed to synods and similar gatherings, and these too concerned not with theology but with ecclesiastical politics¹⁰, we shall find that Gerbert composed ¹¹ not one theological work, or, if he wrote them,

¹¹ Cf. infra,
append. iii.

¹⁰ It would be more accurate to say, one sermon (De inform. episc., Migne 139. 169-178) and one speech of a substantive character and of undisputed authenticity (that delivered before the council of Mouson in 995, Mansi 19. 193 D-196 B; 1774): see the bibliography in Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. med. et inf. Aet. 3. 43 sq., ed. Florence 1858.

they have been lost; for the only treatise of this class which has been ascribed to him may be nearly certainly accepted as the production not of Gerbert but of his contemporary Heriger, abbat of Lobbes¹¹. CHAP. III.

It was indeed in practical affairs that Gerbert's interest was engaged, and his thoughts no more than his actions were disquieted by any considerations of religion. From a teacher Gerbert became a politician. We discern his character in the arts by which he obtained the archbishoprick of Rheims¹². Full of resource, unscrupulous in intrigue, he had the shrewdness, the practical sagacity, of a man of the world: moral difficulties were no difficulties to him. His record lies not in a fancied inauguration of the crusades, (this was to all appearance but the ¹¹ The book De corpore et sanguine domini (Migne 139. 177 sqq.), at first printed as anonymous, was reëdited by Bernhard Pez from a manuscript at Goettweih which bore Gerbert's name: see the editor's dissertatio isagogica to his The-saurus Anecd. noviss. 1 pp. lxxviii, lxxix; and the ascription has been generally admitted without suspicion. See the Histoire littéraire de la France 6. 587 sq., 1742; Ne-ander, History of the Christian Religion and Church 6. 308; Gfroerer, Kirchengeschichte 3. 1585; cf. supra, p. 76, n. 24. Long ago, however, the laborious Mabillon found reason to attribute the work to Heriger; see his preface to the Actt. SS. O. S. B. 4 (2) pp. xxii-xxiv, Paris 1680 folio: and the testimony of Pez's single manuscript seems to be decisively invalidated in favour of this supposition by the arguments of Dr R. Koepke (praef. in Herigeri et Anselmi Gest. episc., Pertz 7. 146 sq.) and of Dr Vogel, Ratherius 2. 46 sqq.

¹² The general duplicity and want of principle of his conduct in this affair are plain; but it would take us too far afield if we were to examine the Acts of the synod of Saint Basol by which his predecessor was deposed. They are printed in Bouquet 10. 513 sqq., and in Pertz 3. 658-686. The remarkable speech of Arnulf bishop of Orleans, which depicts the degradation of the papacy and fearlessly proposes an entire secession from its authority (Pertz 672 sq., 676), has been substantially reproduced by most of the historians: see Gfroerer 3. 1476 sqq., cf. vol. 4. 508; Milman 3. 338 sqq.; Giesebrecht 1. 654 sq. It deserves mention in this place because the Acts, if we are to believe Richer, Hist. iv. 51 Pertz 3. 648, and Gerbert's own preface, were edited by the latter; and, the province of an editor being undefined, we may reasonably give him a considerable share not only of the diction but of the spirit of the speech: cf. Ne-ander 6. 132 n. 1.

^{*} H. von Sybel, gesch. d. ersten kreuzzuges 458, 2nd ed., 1881.

CHAP. III. the potency of such an appeal a century later;) but in the imperial projects which he impressed on the boy Otto the Third and whereby he hoped to restore to Rome her ancient glory. Gerbert the magician is an imagination of later growth, but the currency of the fable bears witness to the uniqueness of his position¹³. A scholar who did not meddle with the higher questions of faith and thought could only, it appeared, be susceptible to influences of an opposite and infernal origin.

Yet the studies which Gerbert avoided were in fact the more dangerous, and it is more than a coincidence that the contemporary reawakening of interest in intellectual things was accompanied by a strange crop of heresies.

7 Cf. Milman 7 In a time of mental ferment, now as often in the history
4. 326 sqq., of Christianity, it was impossible to restrain the specula-335- tions of men with undisciplined faculties, and secluded, as most of the scholars of the middle ages were, in monasteries. The relief which some monks would find from the routine of devotion in works of husbandry or handicraft, the more cultivated would seek in meditation on the mysteries of religion or the secrets of philosophy. If they were teachers such enquiries might be initiated by the questions of pupils. The ambition of novelty, of originality, would be another stimulus to metaphysical exploits; and novelty of this sort would seldom lie within the bounds of the traditional dogma. Men of a less independent spirit whose minds were just opening to the apprehension of difficulties in the doctrinal system of the church, would be content to accept any new solution of their doubts that was offered to them. In the present instance it was probably contact with the dispersed heretics of the oriental church that kindled the flame¹⁴, and henceforward in various lands and under various forms there is a constant current of opposition to the authorised belief of Christendom. Unlike the properly intellectual movement, it affected the easily excited people even more than the clergy. The character of the sectaries, their temperance, their earnestness, their devotion, which appeared in a noble contrast with the greed, the profligacy, the worldliness, of the orthodox, were readily accepted as credentials for the truth of their tenets. The history of these heretics has, however, less interest than some of their peculiarities might seem to promise. What, for instance, can be said of the story told by Rodulph Glaber of a countryman of Vertus near Châlons who had a vision, at its warning put away his wife, went to the church, there destroyed a cross and a picture of the Saviour, and declaimed to the people on the wickedness of paying tithes¹⁵? It is added that he sustained his assertions by passages from the Bible, while explaining that what the prophets said was in part not to be believed: whence we

¹³ It is significant that Gerbert was too much of a personality to be lost in his pontifical title. Thus in the Fleury chronicle, a. 1002, we have his obituary as Girbertus Papa, Baluze, Miscell. 2. 307;

1679. On the genesis of the story about Gerbert's magical powers and league with the devil, see J. J. I. von Doellinger, Die Papst-Fabeln des Mittelalters, 155-159, Munich 1863.

CHAP. III.

A. D. 1000.

¹⁴ The historical review prefixed to Mr Arthur J. Evans's travels Through Bosnia and the Herzegovina, pp. xxiv-xliii, 1876, abundantly shows that such an influence was possible as early as the tenth century; it is admitted by Neander, 6. 429, 439; and the fact that it existed later may justify the conclusion that similar results were produced by similar means at the time with which we are here concerned. The firm hold too which the name Bulgarian, as a term of the most infamous import, has taken both in the French and English languages, points in the same direction.

¹⁵ As 'omnimodis superfluum et inane,' Rod. Glab. hist. ii. 11, Bouquet 10. 23. The chronicler is sure that the man (his name was Leutard) was out of his mind; and it is remarkable that the bishop to whom the scene was reported felt satisfied with the explanation and let him go free. The issue was favourable to this decision, for Leutard proceeded to drown himself in a reaction, it was said, of despair. At the same time, as Neander hints, p. 445, the suspicion suggests itself that the suicide was a figment and that the enthusiast fell a victim to the fanatic zeal of the populace.

CHAP. III. may gather that he had imbibed some of the special doctrines of the eastern Paulicians, whose loyalty to the New Testament is supposed (*though the evidence is conflicting) to have been balanced by their repudiation of the Old. An extreme case like this betrays, with however much exaggeration, the characteristics of medieval heresy, an incongruous mixture of heterogeneous elements, a dualism borrowed from the religion of Zoroaster, ill-compacted with a rationalism that claimed to represent the teaching of saint Paul.

* See Evans
pp. xxix, xxx.

From the first ages of Christianity there had always been a tendency more or less widely operative, to free the religion from its burthen of Jewish principles and traditions. The puritanism of the Hebrew scriptures was exchanged for another puritanism resting upon the idea of the essential evilness of matter. Marcion and Manes at different epochs framed systems of which the uniting principle was the double reign of good and evil. The authority of the prime God was confronted by a restless malignant power whose rule was coëval with the existence of the universe. The opposition of spirit and matter, of good and evil, was so fundamental that it was impossible to conceive the physical incarnation of the Deity in a human body or his liability to the sufferings of man: such facts, they held with the primitive docetists, were illusions to the senses; they were true only in an ideal acceptation. The same principle forbade their allowing any spiritual, or at least any perfecting, virtue to the material act of baptism or to the sacramental elements of bread and wine. They rejected every emblem of religious worship, the image, the painted cross, the reliques of saints. The human soul was deprived of all accessory aids to salvation, of all that interposed between spirit and spirit: celibacy, the proof of its conquest over matter, was the one indispensable condition to eternal happiness. The schemes of the Manicheans and the Marcionites diverged principally in the idea of the church. Manes inaugurated a priestly caste: Marcion had asserted equal rights for all Christians. The theory of the one was sacerdotal; of the other, congregational. CHAP. III.

From Syria the Marcionites, or as they were afterwards known, the Paulicians, ^aspread over the eastern provinces of Asia Minor. They seem to have absorbed the remnant of the Manicheans; at least they inherited their ill-repute: original differences of doctrine may have been forgotten in community of oppression¹⁶. They grew strong and resisted, for a while were victorious; it was attempted to break their strength by a policy of transportation, and numbers were carried over at different times into Thrace, where they came to form a powerful and aggressive community. Extending from Bulgaria among the strictly Slavonian populations of Servia and Bosnia, the ^bBogomiles, as they are now called, appear to have found the soil already ^cpartly prepared for the reception of their teaching by the primitive beliefs and customs of the people; and from these lands, by channels of which we are imperfectly informed, ^dthey passed into Sicily, Italy, France, and even Germany; and from the end of the tenth century onward there is hardly a generation in which the catholic church was not troubled by the

^a See Finlay, hist. of Greece 3. 243, &c.

^b Ibid., p. 67.

^c Cf. Evans pp. xxxii-xxxiv.

^d Cf. Gibbon 7. 138 sq.

¹⁶ In this way only, as it appears to me, can we reconcile the title usually applied to the heretics of western Europe with their known lineage from the Paulicians whose teaching in regard to the church was plainly opposed to Manichæism: cf. Evans pp. xxxiii, xxxiv.

The distinction is pointed out by Mosheim, Institt. Hist. eccles. 312, ed. 2, Helmstaedt 1764 quarto; and by Gfroerer 3. 199: it is confounded by Milman 5. 400 sq. See on the whole subject of the history of the sect, Gibbon's fifty-fourth chapter.

CHAP. III. appearance of their spiritual offspring which it confused under the familiar and infamous name of Manicheans.

The success of the heretics was assisted by several circumstances in the ecclesiastical condition of the west. Their views of Christian brotherhood were eagerly welcomed by people who groaned under the pretensions of an unworthy priesthood; their other heresy, the enforcement of celibacy, was already the kernel of faith among the stricter churchmen. That horror for the married state which the saint Augustin had retained from his youthful Manichæism, had already subverted the Christian idea of family life. It was the instrument which the reformers of the tenth and eleventh centuries again borrowed from the heretics, and by which they strove to purify the priesthood; for however the doctrine of celibacy was theoretically admitted, the authority of the church had hitherto interfered but little with the domestic relations of the clergy. Pope Hadrian the Second in the ninth century was himself a married man. The clergy of Milan claimed their right as depending on the express rule of saint Ambrose. In Germany, England, and France the parish priests lived openly and without blame with their wives¹⁷. The reversal of this state of things, the work of Hildebrand, was undoubtedly designed with the artful sagacity of a statesman; but if his success established the church as a political power, it was fatal to the morality of the clergy.

The defenders of the old custom at Milan were quick to see the dangers that would arise if married persons were excluded from holy orders¹⁸. The historian Landulf

¹⁷ See the vigorous description of Milman 3. 440-447, 468-477; 4. 17-24 (the pages following about Dunstan contain a variety of errors of fact and inference, and may be prudently omitted); also pp. 61 sqq.

¹⁸ This was of course the only point at issue: it was admitted on has preserved a remarkable record (if to some extent CHAP. III. imaginary, hardly less valuable as expressing opinions current in Milan not long after the event took place) of a disputation they held with their opponents on the subject. *One declared that to deprive a priest of his * Landulf iii. 25 p. 92. wife meant simply to multiply his mistresses: vetando unam et propriam uxorem, centum fornicatrices ac adulteria multa concedis. Another, the archdeacon Wibert, recited the praises of married virtue from the Bible and from saint Ambrose, and †boldly declared that whatever was † Cap. 23 p. 90. lawful to a layman was lawful also to a clergyman; for all are priests, whosoever be sons of the church, be they laymen or clerks. They invoked the freedom of the apostolic age, and charged the upholders of celibacy with the taint of those of Montforte, a castle not far from Asti which afforded shelter to a sect whose heresy was a matter of common notoriety at the time¹⁹. The Milanese had chosen a telling argument. The reproach was so far a just one that the party of Peter Damiani and of Hildebrand, and these despised sectaries were in this regard equally fallen from the primitive humanity of their religion.

The fortunes of the western Paulicians need not detain us long. There was no principle of development in their creed; it reflected no genuine freedom of thought. It all hands that no one could marry after ordination: cf. Landulf, hist. Mediolan. iii. 26 Pertz 8. 94; 1848. Gerbert's profession at Rheims, Nuptias non prohibeo, secunda matrimonia non damno, Mansi 19. 108 A, was only the extravagant pledge of a political aspirant: cf. Gfroerer 3. 1462.

¹⁹ Forsitan adhuc illa sententia implicitus es qua olim illi de Monteforti te imbuerant; qui omnem Christianitatem mulierem non tan-gere et genus humanum sine semine virili, apum more, nasci dicentes, falsis sentiis affirmabant: Landulf iii. 26 p. 93. Milman has related this singular debate at some length: vol. 3. 470 n. 2. On the Milanese usage with respect to marriage, compare Anselm the Peripatetic's language: 'Nobis enim clericis quibus licet liceat; in uxoribus et filiis libera est potestas. Usus quidem prestat, ipsa defendit auctoritas.' Rhetorimach. ii. p. 45.

CHAP. III. took root among the obscurest and rudest orders of society, in the ignorant villages of Lombardy or in the low suburbs of the French or Flemish trading towns. An enthusiast, generally an Italian, might stir up the common people and expose them to the vengeance of the church: such were the victims of catholic zeal at Toulouse²⁰, at ^s Arras, Cambrai, and Liège, in the course of the eleventh century. But the influence rarely as yet extended deeper into society, as when, ^b in the case just alluded to, the heretics (here they were clergy as well as laymen) enjoyed the alliance of the countess of Montforte²¹. In one single instance, if its source be not wrongly derived, we find a whole monastic foundation in an important town, a widely-frequented clerical school, pervaded by the dangerous current.

Perhaps the most singular fact in the history of these canons of Saint Cross at Orleans is the silent and unsuspected way in which their sect grew. ⁱ A member of it had been dead three years before his character was discovered. ^k One of the two leaders, Stephen²², had been confessor to the queen of France; ^l he and his colleague Lisoius, or Lisieux, were familiars of the court and of the king. The very council which condemned them admits that they were ^m distinguished among all for wisdom, surpassing in acts of holiness, bountiful in almsgiving. At length their opinions were detected, and a synod con-

^s See Neander 6. 435-439.

^b Cf. ibid., pp. 430-435.

A.D. 1081.

ⁱ Ademar iii. 59 Pertz 4. 143.

^k Gest. syn. Aurel., Bouquet 10. 539 D.

^l Rod. Glab. iii. 8 ibid., p. 35.

^m Gest. syn. Aurel. p. 537 A.

²⁰ Ademar of Chabannais connects the execution of certain Manicheans at Toulouse in 1022 with the appearance of these heralds of Antichrist in many parts of the west: Hist. iii. 59 Pertz 4. 143 (or Bouquet 10. 159 D).

²¹ Milman's treatment of them, 3. 442 sq., 5. 402, is exceptionally perfunctory. It may be noticed that they, unlike the eastern Paulicians, were covetous of martyrdom. The Albigeois after their overthrow returned to the primitive custom of the sect, and dissembled their opinions.

²² Rodulph Glaber calls him Heribert by a mistake that has been often corrected. Heribert was in fact the traitor of the heresy.

vened to examine them. They were charged with nameless atrocities in their secret meetings, calumnies of the same class as those with which the early Christians were wont to insult the heretics of their day, and no doubt as false²³. The judgement, we may be sure, was the more exemplary on account of their previous favour in high places. The persons whose intimacy with the arraigned canons might seem to commit them too deeply to their errors, attested their own innocence by the savage joy with which they heard the sentence,—^a the queen, according to one account, plucked out the eye of her old confessor as he passed from the hall;—and thirteen of the number, two others recanting, perished at the stake.

The Acts of the synod of Orleans suggest no clue as to the origin of this sect. Among contemporaries ° Ademar of Chabannais alone describes it as Manichean. He traces it to the teaching of a certain Rusticus—or was he only a rustic?—of Périgord. ° Rodolph Glaber, on the contrary, says it was imported by a woman from Italy. Both these writers, however, betray too plainly their ignorance of the characteristics and motives of the heretics for us to be at liberty to accept their testimony without corroboration. If we examine the indictment against them, we find a variety of articles showing kinship with the Paulician beliefs. They denied, it was alleged, all the facts of the human life of Christ, the miracles of his birth, his passion, and his resurrection; ° all miracles, they said, were madness, deliramenta. They assailed doc-

CHAP. III.
A.D. 1022.

° Rod. Glab., l.c.

° Hist., l.c.;
cf. vv. 11 in Bouquet
xo. 159 C &
P. Labbé,
nov. bibl.
mss. librr.
2. 180, Paris
1657 folio.
° Hist., ubi supra.

° Ibid.,
p. 36 A, B.

²³ Milman's remark that they 'were, if their accusers speak true, profligates rather than sectarians' (he enters into no detail in the matter) may be contrasted with the judicial impartiality of the Benedictine editors of the acts of the synod, p. 538 n., from whom I have borrowed the parallel in the text. Gibbon has given a lively picture of the corresponding passages in the history of the ancient church, ch. xvi, vol. 2. 155 sq.

CHAP. III.

trines even more intimately bound up with the life of the church, * the regenerating virtue of baptism, and the presence of the body and blood of the Saviour in the eucharistical elements ; they denounced the vanity of invoking saints, the superfluity of the Christian works of piety. Rodulph adds that they held the universe to be eternal and without author, and if the specification be true it would place the canons of Orleans in a position by themselves ; but the tenet is little in keeping with the spirit of their creed. Its general resemblance to the oriental heresy is plain, but it has long been acknowledged that, however probable the relationship may be, there is no necessity to explain its origin in this way ; * it might have sprung up by itself, as the result of a rational speculation, tinctured with mysticism : and even if the first impetus was given from abroad, it remains likely that its dissemination at Orleans was assisted by the reviving spirit of enquiry which was already becoming powerful in France.

* See Mosheim 380 sq., Neander 6. 430 sq., Milman 5. 399 n. 1.

On the other hand, it would undoubtedly be improper to class these beliefs with the other manifestations of opinion divergent from the general tenour of orthodoxy which we meet with in the eleventh century. They indicate at most a link between the profession of an heresy which seemed to the world repulsive, and the assertion of individual views which might be startling, perhaps on that very account attractive, but which excited the anger of rivals rather than of enemies. To the latter order belong the opinions of Berengar of Tours and of Roscelin, who less by the issues to which they pointed than by the intellectual activity which they roused, are counted among the heralds of the scholastic philosophy. Through their resistance the mediæval realism grew into the matured form which it retained until the introduction of the complete works of Aristotle in the thirteenth century. The debate, it is well known, rests upon the problem of the nature of being, a question no doubt insoluble because to all time each man will answer it, spite of argument, according to the special constitution of his own understanding. Existence might be held to reside more truly in the highest and broadest conceptions of which the mind is capable, in truth, in goodness, in every abstraction furthest removed from ocular observation; according to the technical terminology, in the universals. To the realist the ideal was the only true existence; every conception of the mind had necessarily a corresponding reality²⁴. The school of Roscelin proceeded from the opposite extreme, from experience. Our senses, it was felt, are the only certain warrant for existence, and they only reveal to us the individual. The universals, therefore, the cardinal point of dispute, could only be our own generalisations from observed facts.

Roscelin, who brought the latter view prominently into the field of discussion, was not, however, as is commonly presumed, nor was Berengar, the first nominalist of the middle ages. This position, "according to an early chronicler, belongs to John the Sophist, whose identification with John the Scot, long suspected, has been raised to a high degree of probability by the acute arguments of Dr von Prantl. So uncompromising a Platonist as the Scot could not but be a realist in his ontology: but equally little could a logician escape the influence of Aristotle, the philosopher to whom he owed his method; and John's view of language and of the

CHAP. III.

¹ Cf. Hauréau, hist. de la phil. scol. i. 289 sq.

² Cf. supra, pp. 76 sq.

³ Cf. infra, append. iv.

²⁴ I have purposely described the theory by an illustration of its practical issue, since we are hardly at all concerned here with its technical definition.

CHAP. III. scope and functions of logic is far removed from the arid tradition of Isidore and Alcuin. Dialectic, he admitted, had kinship with grammar and rhetoric, in so far as it dealt with human speech pure and simple. But words and thoughts, and therefore words and things, were definitely if imperfectly correlative. John therefore claimed for dialectic a higher dignity than that of a mere mechanical instrument: it was *the searcher out of the common conceptions of the mind*²⁵, the guide of reason.

It was easy to carry this train of reasoning a stage further, and to argue that the general terms with which logic occupies itself are not its source but its product. The universals, the Scot had agreed, are words; what if they be mere words? Already in his lifetime the suggestion was taken up by Heric of Auxerre, whose pupil however, saint Remigius of Auxerre, reverted to a declared realism. ⁷The party division may therefore be safely dated from the close of the ninth century. Remigius was a far more important person than Heric. At Rheims, and afterwards at Paris, he was unrivalled as a teacher of grammar, dialectic, and music; and the rapidly advancing greatness of the Paris school, assisted by the reputation not only of the teacher but of such of his pupils as ²Odo, the second abbat of Clugny and the creator of its fame, would naturally tend to fix the principles of Remigius in an age which had no mind for independent thought. Thus, with apparently the single exception of the learned centre of ^aSaint Gall, realism held everywhere an undisputed reign. Gerbert, whose dialectical activity is represented for us by a debate in which he took part before Otto the Third, and ⁷ Cf. infra, append. iv.

^a See Gfroerer 3. 1335 sqq.

^a Prantl, gesch. d. log. im abendl. 2. 62-67.

²⁵ Communium animi conceptionum rationabilium diligens investigatrixque disciplina: De div. nat. i. 29 p. 19.

by a slight treatise in which he pursued a little further one of the points raised on that occasion, was hardly at all in sympathy with the subjective aims of metaphysics; although ^bprobably his literary interest and his energy as a teacher were the means of restoring to the use of the schools some of the materials for logical study which had fallen into neglect in the century before him. ^cOtherwise his practical temper was satisfied to accept the tradition as he found it. It was not until thought was again turned to religious questions, and doctrine subjected to the test of reason, that the opposition was revived.

CHAP.

^b Haur
I. 212 sq
& in the et extr.
manusc
20 (2) 2
^c Cf. P.
2. 53-57

The principles of the realist combined readily with a Christian idealism: he relied upon the safe foundation of authority—the various elements of the church tradition, the Bible, the fathers, the canons of councils, and the decretals of popes;—and treated logic as its useful but docile handmaid²⁶. The nominalist on the contrary, though he might not wish to overthrow the ancient and respectable fabric of authority, reduced its importance by giving, ^das John Scot gave, an equal if not a superior place to reason. Reason was the basis on which he rested, and logic, as the method which controlled the exercise of its powers, became the science of sciences. It was therefore natural that the dialectical reaction should ally itself with the protest of reason against the dogma of transubstantiation. ^eBerengar of Tours, who maintained what is called the Zwinglian view of the Lord's supper, is therefore so far the beginner of the new movement that the rationalism of the opinions he put forth

^d Supra
pp. 66 sq

^e Cf. H. réau his
i. 222 sq

²⁶ 'Quae tamen artis humanae peritia,' says saint Peter Damiani (ap. Prantl 2. 68 n. 281), 'si quando tractandis sacris eloquiis adhibetur, non debet ius magisterii sibimet arroganter arripere, sed velut ancilla dominae quodam familiatus obsequio subservire.'

CHAP. III. set the whole catholic world thinking, questioning, disputing. Himself ready enough to recant under pressure, the number of his direct disciples may not have been large: but the stream of speculation once let loose, could not be restrained at will. It was a time of religious reform, and reform went hand in hand with the promotion of education. Monasteries and their schools were restored or founded in a continually expanding circle. They busied themselves with the rudimentary 'arts' of the Trivium, grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic; and the last, because of its universal applicability, remained the most popular study even for those who proceeded to the higher branches of the Quadrivium, or to the faculties of theology or law. The disputations which in the English universities only died out at the beginning of the present century, and even now retain a formal existence in the superior faculties, are the shadowy survivors of a system which was in its fresh ardour in the eleventh century. To the enthusiastic dialectician everything would seem to depend upon the turn of a debate; a challenge to a disputation was as serious as a challenge to the combat: logic became the centre round which all speculation revolved, and the question about its metaphysical basis became the absorbing one for all who pretended to share in the commonwealth of scholars.

Nevertheless the suspicion with which theologians regarded the new study was not soon averted. Apart from antecedent principles it was not likely that they should look with approval upon an art in which they were usually outmatched by their opponents. Archbishop Lanfranc, a learned man and a good lawyer, was greatest in the practical affairs of the state: in dialectical warfare he showed but poorly. He vanquished Berengar transparent sophisms. Logic in his hands was an imperfect instrument which he had not fully learned to use. Judged by his writings, Lanfranc belongs entirely to the dark ages, whose trivialities he delights to repeat²⁷:

Berengar who opens the new age of enlightenment; nominalism, which is for the time the party of progress. The difference between this controversy and that which was provoked by Roscelin towards the close of the eleventh century is worth noticing. Whereas Berengar seems to have been led by moral doubts in reference to the Eucharist of the Lord's supper, to investigate minutely its meaning to belief and thus to open the whole question of the meaning of authority²⁸, while the dialectical form which his polemic was cast was the last stage in his intellectual process; in Roscelin's case the order was reversed. The conclusion of the one was the starting-point of the other. By the sheer honesty and consistency of his logic Roscelin came to dispute the accepted dogma of the holy Trinity. He refused to exempt any part from the jurisdiction of reason, and fearlessly applied nominalistic principles to the supreme problem. God, he argued, the three persons are one thing and not three things, then the Father and the holy Ghost must have been incarnate with the Son: if on the contrary they be three things each by itself severally, as three angels or three

²⁷ Cf. Reuter
I. 92 sqq.

On Lanfranc's controversy with Berengar see the extracts in Prantl n. 308, and compare Rémusat, op. cit. 2. 162 sq. Perhaps however we are hardly justified in laying finite stress as Dr von Prantl vol. 2. 73 notes 302, 303, on Lanfranc's performances in the Elucidarium, a text-book of theology in which the authorship is by no means certain. It has been variously ascribed to Augustin, to Guibert of Nogent, and to Honorius of Autun; as well as to saint Anselm, among whose works it has even appeared in print. See the Histoire littéraire de la France, 12. 167; 1763.

²⁸ Dr Reuter's observation, I. 93, of the tendency of the transubstantiation dogma, 'das mirakel hörte auf mittel zu sein, es wurde zweck,' is penetrating and just.

CHAP. III. *souls, yet so as in will and power they be altogether one, then, did usage permit, we ought to speak of three Gods*²⁹. The terms of the dilemma are those which in the early history of Christianity had been inspired only by the venom of enemies. Rejecting the error charged to the patripassians, Roscelin frankly accepted the reproach of tritheism³⁰. But we may learn from the extreme rigour with which he stated the alternatives, that with him there was not a religious principle but simply a speculative position at stake³¹.

If it was almost an accident of time that connected Roscelin with a theological debate, it was certainly nothing more that involved saint Anselm in one of dialectics. A thinker of immensely larger capacity than Lanfranc, Anselm, like his predecessor in the see of Canterbury, belongs in spirit to the past. He is, it has been finely said, ^sthe last of the fathers. Unlike Lanfranc, he belongs also to the far future: as a philosopher, he is in at least one notable train of reasoning the parent of Descartes. His serene vision overlooks the chasm of scholasticism; he is not engulfed in it. Some of the questions on which he meditated are so alien from the temper of his time that one cannot but ask whence he derived the impulse. To this question, however, ^hno

^s Hauréau
1. 269.

^h Cf. infra,
append. v.

²⁹ The argument as reported to Anselm (Baluze, Miscell. 2. 174, ed. Mansi) and stated by him in the De fide trinitatis, i. p. 41 b, presents but one horn of the dilemma. Both are given, but in a somewhat involved form, in Anselm's letter to Fulk of Beauvais, Epp. ii. 41 p. 357 b. I have extracted the statement in the text from a comparison of these three passages.

³⁰ In the third century however the name was ditheism, Milman 1. 51. The variation indicates one of the wide-reaching changes which Latin Christianity made in the subject-matter of theology.

³¹ This was long ago seen by the candid Mosheim, p. 382, 2nd note. Still the charge of blasphemous heresy long clung to Roscelin; see Abailard's letter to the bishop of Paris, written about 1120, Opp. 2. 150, ed. Cousin: and Roscelin's reply, ibid. pp. 796-801, still insists, in however modified language, upon the Three in preference to the One.

answer has yet been given, and for the present we may still believe that the idea of constructing an argument for the existence of God originated in his solitary thought. At first indeed Plato, through the channel of saint Augustin, supplied him with the suggestion that the existence of relative good upon earth implies the existence of an absolute Good of which it is a reflexion. To this purpose he wrote the Monologion. But he was not content until he had perfected an argument the profoundness of which might, he felt, appeal to every reasonable man. Such he discovered in the famous 'ontological' argument of the Proslogion, that the existence of God is proved by our thought of him³². It is the very subtilty of the conception that makes the reasoning silent to mere logicians; but among philosophers it has commanded a wide-spread sympathy. Anselm's confidence in its truth has been justified by the manner in which his argument has been woven and re-woven into the systems of modern thought.

Thus Anselm's interest lay in a field above the controversies of logic; his thoughts did not readily move within that formal circle. He joined of necessity in debates to which one cannot be brought to believe that he devoted his best faculties³³. The technical victory¹

CHAP. III.

Prantl 2.
86.

³² The argument has been spoken of as derived from Augustin and Boëthius, but it is clearly shown by F. R. Haase, Anselm von Canterbury 2. 240 (1852), that this statement rests upon a confusion of the motive of the Proslogion with that of the Monologion. Those who have not leisure for the extended analysis of Anselm's philosophy contained in the work just cited, vol. 2. 34-286, will find a brief but luminous summary in dean Church's Saint Anselm 74-79, ed.

1881. Mr Martin Rule's Life and Times of saint Anselm, in two volumes, 1883, has hardly a title to be considered a serious literary production.

³³ Cousin justly remarks, 'il retombe dans la barbarie de son temps dès qu'il quitte le christianisme et s'engage dans la dialectique scholastique... Ce n'est pas là qu'il faut chercher saint Anselme.' Fragments philosophiques 2. 102, 5th ed., 1865.

CHAP. III. in one notorious case certainly lay with his opponent, and although our scanty information of the literary proceedings of the time tells us nothing relevant of the reception of his other writings, we may be fairly sure that the realists, or traditionary party, had not yet trained themselves to the same expertness in the manipulation of logic which the nominalists already possessed. A story told by a chronicler of the abbey of Saint Martin at Tournay, and relating to the last years of the century, throws a curious light upon this relation. ^k There was a master there, Odo, afterwards bishop of Cambray, whose fame was so eminent that not only from France, Flanders, and Normandy, but even from far distant Italy, Saxony, and Burgundy, divers clergymen flowed together in crowds to hear him daily; so that if thou shouldst walk about the public places of the city and behold the throngs of disputants—greges disputantium—thou wouldst say that the citizens had left off their other labours and given themselves over entirely to philosophy. But after a while a check came. Odo, who was an old-fashioned realist, found his position menaced by the increasing popularity of a certain Raimbert and a whole school of nominalists at Lisle; since ^l it was observed that the lectures of the latter had a much more practical result in training men to reasoning and to readiness of speech; maxime quia eorum lectiones ad exercitium disputandi vel eloquentiae, imo loquacitatis et facundiae, plus valere dicebant. Yet there could be no fault in Odo, for he departed not from the doctrine of the ancients. Thus exercised in his mind, therefore, one of the canons of the church had recourse to a wizard, who unhesitatingly declared in favour of the realist. To him realism had indeed the support of authority; and the fact expressed under this grotesque guise still holds good in a more reasonable form

^k Herimann. nov. restaur.
abbatiae
s. Martin.
Tornac. i.
d'Achery, spicil. 2.
889 a, ed.
1723.

^l Ibid. ii.
p. 889 b.

when we approach the master to whose credit is usually assigned the establishment of realism. The distinction of the parties is still the same; the realism of William of Champeaux, like that of saint Anselm, ^mproceeds from a metaphysical rather than a logical starting-point. CHAP. III.
†1121.
^m See Prantl
2. 128.

But the dialectical spirit was now too strong to endure a subordinate rank: it animated the realists, now that ⁿWilliam of Champeaux had given them a tangible formula, just as vigorously as the nominalists. But the formula was no sooner discovered than the appearance of Abailard, and his criticism first of one side and then of the other, drove each to its defences. The immediate effect of this disturbance was to break up the parties into manifold subdivisions. ^oJohn of Salisbury, the acutest historian of the movement, reckons no less than ten distinct positions on the main dialectical problem, and this enumeration is not exhaustive ³⁴. With this universal outburst of criticism the rational history of the middle ages enters into its second youth. The interval of darkness is now quite past. The age of the church schools is about to be succeeded by the age of the universities. The nature of the discussion indeed takes it out of the sphere of any but a professed history of philosophy, not merely because of its extremely technical form, which it is difficult to render into modern language, but also because the apparent minuteness and triviality of its distinctions, unless subjected to a long and searching examination, tend rather to conceal than to disclose the intellectual ferment from which it sprang. But we shall learn perhaps more of the real character of the age

ⁿ See Cousin
2. 123, Hau-réau 1. 320.

^o Metalog.
ii. 17
pp. 814 sqq.,
Policrat.
vii. 12
pp. 451 sq.

³⁴ A very lucid summary of the principal points of difference will be found in Carl Schaarschmidt's Johannes Saresberiensis nach Leben und Studien, Schriften und Philosophie 319 sqq.; 1862. See also the more detailed analysis given by Dr von Prantl, vol. 2. 118 sqq.

- CHAP. III. and of the forces at work in it by studying the manner — in which men learned and taught, and had their controversies, and making acquaintance with some types of its culture, than by a direct analysis of its dialectical theories.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SCHOOL OF CHARTRES.

AT the beginning of the twelfth century three schools are distinguished in the contemporary literature above the multitude which had sprung into new life in France and were connected with so many of her cathedrals and religious houses. These three were at Laon, Paris, and Chartres. It would be more accurate to say, they were the schools of Anselm and Ralph, of William of Champeaux, and of Bernard Sylvester. For in those days the school followed the teacher, not the teacher the school. Wherever a master lived, there he taught; and thither, in proportion to his renown, students assembled from whatever quarter. Thus it had been at Tournay, as we have seen, under Odo, at Bec under Lanfranc and Anselm, and still earlier under Fulbert at Chartres. The tie was a personal one, and was generally severed by the master's death. A succession of great teachers in one place was a rare exception; nor is such an exception afforded by the history of any of the three schools to which we have referred.

The eminence of William of Champeaux drew logical students to Paris, but not because he taught at Paris. The success of one of them, Abailard, *in forcing his master to modify the basis of his system added a peculiar notoriety to a school whose fame was already established:

CHAP. IV.

* Abael. hist. calam. ii. opp. i. 5, ed. Cousin, 1849.

CHAP. IV.

for William's action heralded the downfall of the old-fashioned realism, and the orthodox system, heretofore so solid and substantial, came to acknowledge sects whose number and division might contrast unfavourably with the comparative unity of their rivals. Moreover the exciting presence of Abailard tended to give Paris a permanent importance as a seat of learning. The natural pugnacity of youth gathered crowds of students to a scene where an endless encounter was going on, in their several lecture-rooms, between the heads of the opposing parties. Paris became the centre of the dialectical struggle, and in another generation we see it filled with the noise of a new populace of schools set up in every part by ambitious teachers. But the schools of William of Champeaux flourished only with their master. We are not even certain who occupied his place at Notre Dame; for it is only a hazardous guess that identifies his successor with ^b Robert of Melun: nor is the celebrity of Saint Victor, where the later years of Champeaux's life as a teacher were passed, any the more connected with him. He left the priory on his elevation to the see of Châlons, a name for dialectic: but that which made the enduring reputation of the abbey (^cit obtained this dignity in the year of, or the year after, his removal) was something quite different. It was an impulse of reâction to the dialectic movement, due to the presence among its canons of Hugh of Saint Victor. The spirit which he infused was more theological and religious, less instinctively literary, far less secular. This was the stamp of the mystics of Saint Victor which long remained their common tradition; but it was not the legacy of William of Champeaux.

The two other great schools of France have this like-

^b Schaar-schmidt, Johannes Saresberiensis 72.

A.D. 1112.

^c Duchesne,
not. xii. in hist. calam.,
Abael. opp.
1. 42; hist.
litt. de la France 10.
308, 1756;
C. de Rému-
sat, Abélard,
1. 16 sqq.;
1845.

†1141.

ness to William's, that they were rigorously realistic; but in neither were dialectics the main interest of the place in the way they were at Paris. Of the school of Laon we know little besides its renown. Its history is comprised within the lifetime of the brothers Anselm and Ralph, whose celebrity attracted scholars from all parts of western Europe. At one time we see a band of clergymen from Milan, the rival of Rome, prouder in her religious tradition than any other church in Christendom, journeying to Laon that they might sit at the feet of the acknowledged masters in theology¹. At another² it is Wicelin, a mature teacher at Bremen, who gives up his school and spends some years in France, learning the interpretation of holy Writ from the same masters. Anselm, the 'doctor of doctors', the pupil perhaps of his more famous namesake at Bec³, was at different times the master both of William of Champeaux, who seems to have been in some sort regarded as his legitimate successor⁴, and of Abailard, 'who characteristically

CHAP. IV.

⁴ Helmold. chron. Slav. i. 45 Pertz 21. 46 sq.; 1869.

^{*} Abael. hist. cal. iii. opp. i. 7: cf. Hug. Metell., ubi infra.

¹ Landulf de s. Paulo, Hist. Mediol. xxv Pertz 20. 30 sq. One of these visitors is mentioned in a letter by an Italian student at Laon, perhaps a little later, printed in the Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, 4th series, i. 465 sq. Another letter, ibid., p. 466, shows how largely the school was frequented. Compare the Histoire littéraire 10. 173-176, where an extensive list of its disciples is given.

² The title seems an accepted one: see one of the supplements to Sigebert of Gembloux, Auctar. Affligemense, a. 1100, Pertz 6. 400; John of Salisbury, Epist. ccii, Max. Bibl. Patr. 23. 490 B.

³ Histoire littéraire 10. 171. The statement that Anselm of Laon had previously taught at Paris appears, so far as I can discover, to rest upon the patriotic sentiment of du Boulay and the authors of the Histoire littéraire rather than upon any positive testimony.

⁴ 'Mortuo Anselmo Laudunensi et Guillelmo Catalaunensi,' wrote Hugo Metellus in his bombastic style to Innocent the Second, 'ignis verbi dei in terra defecit:' ep. iv, C. L. Hugo, Sacrae Antiquitatis Monumenta 2. 331, Saint Dié 1731 folio. Compare Reiner, a monk of Saint Laurence at Liège, writing about the year 1190, who couples the names together as 'opinatissimos tunc Franciae magistros:' De ineptiis cuiusdam idiotae i, Pertz 20. 596. To carry on the testimony with respect to Anselm's reputation later we may quote Vincent of Beauvais, Speculum naturale xxxiii. 93, who speaks of him as 'magister nominatissimus scientia morum, et honestate clarus.'

CHAP. IV. despised him as an eloquent man without much judgement; not to speak of Alberic of Rheims, Gilbert de la Porrée, and many more of the theological students of the time. ^f He died as early as 1117, and the ^gschool was thenceforward directed by his brother alone; but it seems to have soon lost its peculiar eminence, and with Ralph's death in ^h1138 it sank again into the obscurity from which their single efforts had raised it.

^f [Sigebert] Auct. Laudun. ad ann., Pertz 6. 445.
^g Herimann. de miraculis s. Mar. Laudun. iii. 4, Pertz 12. 656.
^h Hist. litt. 10. 191.

Apart from the personal weight of the teachers, the school had acquired a peculiar and almost unique name for the steadfast fidelity with which it maintained and handed on the pure theological tradition of the church. A generation after Anselm, many years after Ralph, had passed away, their authority is appealed to in the same unquestioned manner as an English clergyman might appeal to Hooker or Barrow. ⁱIt is relied on as irrefragable by Robert de Bosco, archdeacon of Châlons, in connexion with the trial for heresy of Gilbert de la Porrée in 1148; and later still in 1159 ^kJohn of Salisbury avers that no one would dare to detract in public from the lustre of those most splendid lights of Gaul, the glory of Laon, whose memory is in pleasantness and blessing. It is supposed, but on what grounds we are ignorant, that while Anselm devoted himself to the field of theology, Ralph instructed the school in the 'liberal arts' generally; but as to the sort of teaching he gave we have absolutely no information. The gap appears all the greater in comparison with the ampleness and vivid detail of our knowledge of the school of Chartres, which has a remarkable individuality among the schools of the time. Its interest was not theological nor principally dialectical, but literary: its character was that of a premature humanism. The golden age of the ⁱ Joh. Salisb. hist. pontif. viii, Pertz 20. 523; cf. Gaufrid. Claraevall. libell. contra capp. Gilleberti, Bernardi opp. 2. 1338 C, ed. Mabillon, Paris 1690 folio.

^k Metalogic. i. 5 p. 746.

school is nearly contemporary with that of Anselm of Laon and William of Champeaux; but it is carried on to a much later date through the long life of its master Bernard Sylvester, whom John of Salisbury signalises as ^{CHAP. IV.}
¹ in modern times the most abounding spring of letters in Gaul. ^{1 Metal. i. 24 p. 78a.}

The cathedral school of Chartres had early in the preceding century been famous as a house of religious learning. Its president, the saintly Fulbert, a pupil of Gerbert, was one of those quick-souled teachers who, just as saint Anselm two generations later, gave so powerful an impulse to the reviving civilisation of the time. Even ²after his elevation to the bishoprick of his own city, Fulbert still continued to follow his chosen calling among the scholars of the cloister. The position he won as a teacher—Berengar of Tours was among his pupils,—and the name of ‘Socrates’ by which his scholars delighted to remember him, bear witness to the attractive force of his personality ³. At his death, says the biographer of saint Odilo, ⁴*the study of philosophy in France decayed, and the glory of her priesthood well-nigh perished.* But Fulbert’s learning was that of a divine not of a scholar, and his idea of teaching is typical of his age. He loved of an evening to take his disciples apart in the little garden beside the chapel, and discourse to them of the prime duty of life, to prepare for the eternal fatherland hereafter. Without invitat ad se votis et tacitis precibus, obtestans per secreta illa et vespertina colloquia quae nobiscum in hortulo iuxta capellam de civitate quam deo volente senator nunc possidet, saepius habebat, et obsecrans per lachrymas . . . ut illuc omni studio properemus, viam regiam directim gradientes:’ Ep. ad Bereng., Max. Biblioth. Patrum 18. 438 D, E.

¹ Adelmann, scholastic of Liège and afterwards bishop of Brescia, writing to Berengar of Tours, recalls prettily ‘dulcissimum illud contubernium quod . . . in academia Carnotensi sub nostro illo venerabili Socrate iucundissime duxi . . . Sed absque dubio memor nostri, diligens plenius quam cum in corpore mortis huius peregrinaretur,

² Lotsald.
[Lotsald.]
vit. Odil. viii.
32, Actt. SS.
1 Jan. p. 68 a;
1643.

CHAP. IV. this presiding thought there was infinite danger in the study of letters: they were only worth cultivating in so far as they ministered to man's knowledge of divine things.

We have no information concerning the fortunes of the school of Chartres after Fulbert's death in 1029⁶; but it is natural to presume that the literary tradition of the city, if not unbroken, was before long restored by the presence, whether his influence was actively exercised or not⁷, of its bishop, the great lawyer Ivo, ° a religious man, as he is described, and of great learning, who in his youth had heard master Lanfranc, prior of Bec, treat of secular and divine letters in that famous school which he had at Bec. Certainly some time towards the close of Ivo's life (he died in 1115⁸) the school emerges again into notice under the rule, first, it should seem, of Theodoric, and then of his brother Bernard⁹; and thence forward, down to near the middle of the twelfth century, it enjoyed a peculiar distinction, continually growing until it became almost an unapproached pre-° Rob. de Monte, chr., a. 1117, Pertz 6. 485.

⁶ The date I give according to the new reckoning: see Mabillon, Vet. Anal. 231 ed. 1723; Gall. Christ. 8. 1116 B, Paris 1744 folio. The old account makes it 1028: Max. Biblioth. Patrum 18. 3 A, B.

⁷ 'Scholas fecit' in the Martyrologium Ecclesiae Carnotensis prefixed to Juretus' edition of Ivo's letters, Paris 1610, and in Gallia Christiana 8. 1133 A, is so far as I am aware a solitary notice: nor need it mean much. The Histoire littéraire 10. 112 says that Ivo rebuilt the schools.

⁸ I again follow the Martyrologium and Gallia Christiana 8. 1132 A. Other dates, 1116 and 1117, are probably to be explained by the slowness with which news travelled in those days.

⁹ The Histoire littéraire, 12. 261, rightly points out that all the facts related of Bernard of Chartres and his opinions agree with the writings bearing the name of Bernard Sylvester. The accord indeed is too exact to make anything but an identification possible. The further identification, which I had long suspected, of this Bernard with the brother of Theodoric is fortified by new arguments in a paper of M Hauréau printed in the Comptes rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-lettres, 3rd series, 1. 75 sqq., 1873. Previously however it has been usual to follow the Histoire littéraire 13. 376, 1814, in considering them to be two different persons.

eminence, among the schools of Gaul. The names of the two brothers are taken by ^pOtto of Freising, as a typical instance to illustrate the dangerous nimbleness of Breton wits, a characteristic of which Abailard furnished a still more striking example: ^qAbailard himself adduces them (if it be really to them that he refers) in proof of the perverse theological views that could be maintained by persons holding the highest rank as teachers. Unlike Abailard, however, neither came into serious conflict with the ecclesiastical authorities, and ^rBernard was chosen in his old age to occupy the bishoprick of Quimper in his native Britany, where ^she died in 1167.

^tTheodoric and Bernard were both canons and successively chancellors of the church of Chartres ¹⁰. The former is mentioned by John of Salisbury as "a most diligent investigator of the arts, and ^uexpressly as a logician; of his skill as a teacher of rhetoric, John ^vspeaks in less favourable terms. If we are to credit a ^wcurious story, to which we think there are grounds for attaching some authority, it will appear that it was this same scholar who attempted to instruct Abailard in the rudiments of mathematics. Tirric, as he is here called (the name is already softening into Thierry), is again doubtless one with the Terric, ^xa master of the schools, who took part in Abailard's trial at Soissons, and the ^yTheodoric of Chartres who was present many years later at that of Gilbert de la Porrée at Rheims.

¹⁰ Dr Schaarschmidt, Johannes Saresberiensis 22 and 73, speaks of Bernard as dean of Chartres; and a dignitary of that name certainly appears in Gallia Christiana 8. 1199 c as signing a deed about the year 1130. His successor Zacharias emerges between the years

1131 and 1141. But as the Bernard with whom we are concerned is described only as cancellarius ecclesie Carnotensis (Robert de Monte, ubi supra; Gallia Christiana 14. 877 D) I suppose that the one identification excludes the other.

CHAP. IV.

^p De gest. Frideric. i. 47. Pertz 20. 376.

^q Theol. Christ. iv. opp. 2. 522 sq.; cf. Rémusat, Abailard 2. 210 n. 1.

A. D. 1159.

^r Rob. de Monte a.

1159 p. 510.

^s Gall. Christ.

14. 878 A;

1856.

^t Hauréau, comptes ren-dus, l. c., p.

75.

^u Metalog. i.

5 p. 705.

^v Lib. iv. 24

p. 905.

^w Lib. ii. 10

p. 804.

^x v. infra,

append. viii.

^y Abael. hist.

calam. x.

opp. 1. 22.

A. D. 1121.

A. D. 1148.

^b Mabillon.

ann. o. s. B.

6. 435, Paris

1739, folio.

CHAP. IV.

* v. Hau-réau, hist. de la phil. scol.
1. 393-403.

It was also to the most famous doctor Terric that Bernard dedicated his book On the Universe. A single treatise, one on the six days of creation, represents for us Theodoric's literary production; and of this only a few extracts have been printed. *These suffice, however, to show us how boldly he pushed the principles of realism to their furthest issues, and argued from the doctrine of the unity of all being, that all being is God, and that God is the form of being of all things. How far the author's influence was exercised in the school of Chartres, we are left to surmise from that of his brother, whose philosophy was of a similar complexion. Possibly even while Theodoric was chancellor Bernard took the more active share in that work of teaching which seems to have belonged to the chancellor's official duties. At least it is to Bernard in all probability that the restoration of the school to its old reputation was due. Yet there is little beyond the external relation to connect the teaching of Bernard with that of Fulbert or, for that matter, of Lanfranc. Perhaps the single link is to be discovered in its conservative character, its aversion from modern innovations; but even this attitude marks the great difference between Bernard and his predecessors. They looked back and relied upon Christian doctrine as it had filtered through the dark ages; he sought his models beyond Christianity in the reliques of classical antiquity, and emulated neither the theological weight of Fulbert nor the dialectical prowess, such as it was, of Lanfranc.

Bernard Sylvester¹¹, to give him the title which

¹¹ This form of the name occurs in one of the manuscripts mentioned in the Histoire littéraire

12. 273; while Sylvestris, which as a rule appears as a genitive case, has been generally accepted. Fa-appears in his writings, was a devoted Platonist,—^d*perfectissimus inter Platonicos seculi nostri*, says John of Salisbury,—but instead of for that reason attacking nominalism, he rather sought to win his opponents over to his side by a demonstration of the essential harmony of Plato and Aristotle. We may believe ^eJohn of Salisbury when he says that the proof was unsuccessful; but he gives no details, nor is it likely, to judge from what remains of Bernard's writings, that he entered into a minute examination of the different theories current in his day. He stood by the ancients and took little heed of what appeared to him ephemeral controversies. It is indeed a relief in this tempestuous time to make acquaintance with a man holding a distinguished place as a teacher, who nevertheless pursued his quiet way in the study of the classics, and seemed unconscious of the surrounding tumult. As little was Bernard disturbed by any controversies of theology. When he portrayed the cosmogony according to a scheme compatible only with some form of pantheism, he did it with a frank vigour which we cannot explain unless by supposing that Christian theology (as indeed ^fhe seems in one place to imply) was understood to lie outside the field of the philosopher's vision. In a word, he was a humanist, and had no interest in connecting his speculations with Christianity, no inclination to consecrate his gifts to the service of the church. There is, of course, not the least evidence that he was anything but exemplary in the functions of his order ¹²; neither are we to suppose that

CHAP. IV.

^d Metalog. iv. 35 p. 928.^e Lib. ii. 17 p. 826.^f De mund. univ. ii. 5 p. 40.

bricius however, Biblioth. Lat. med. et inf. Aet. i. 217 a, ed. 1858, has Sylvester. Professor C. S. Barach, to whom we are indebted for the publication of Bernard's treatise De mundi universitate libri ii, sive megacosmus et microcosmus, Innsbruck 1876, prefers Silvester; though his edition varies between the two forms: see the inhalt p. v compared with the dedication p. 5.

¹² On the contrary, if the ar-

CHAP. IV.

he had any doubts or scruples about the established verities of religion. Rather he belonged to that class of which the English church furnishes so copious and so respectable examples, of clergymen who, while irreproachable in matters of faith, do not concern themselves unofficially with them, and are known to the world as men of letters, critics, or philosophers, but least of all things theologians.

Bernard was a scholar of a curious, meditative type. His mind like his style was enigmatic: it expressed itself less readily in prose than in verse; and his chief work, the two short books On the Universe, alternates between hexameters on the model of Lucretius, elegiacs, and prose. The verses have a vigour of their own and give evidence of an extensive knowledge of classical authors, but the prose is concise to obscurity. The form of the work, that of a dialogue woven into a narrative, is also suggestive of the latest classical devices: its spirit is that of an expiring Platonism, oppressed and overweighted by allegory. The whole has an entirely pagan complexion; it proposes to treat of the cosmogony and loses itself in a philosophical mythology. Perhaps it was the very qualities that made the work uninviting to the modern reader, which gave it its singular popularity in the twelfth and even in the thirteenth centuries. It did more than support its author's reputation as a philosopher; it placed him on a level with the choicest models of the middle ages: in a couplet of a contemporary poet, ^bEberhard of Bethune, his book ranks next after the Consolation of Boëthius and the Satyricon of

^a Hist. litt.
12. 271 sq.

^b ap. Fabric.
bibl. Lat.
med. et inf.
act. 2. 488 b.

rangement we have made of the data for Bernard's biography be correct, it will appear that a tablet at Quimper expressly describes him as 'bonum clericum tempore suo:' Gallia Christiana 14. 878 A.

Martianus Capella. Bernard wrote also a commentary CHAP. IV. on the first half of the Aeneid, of which some ¹specimens have been printed. Virgil, he says, ²*in as much as he is a philosopher, describes the nature of human life* under the guise of the history of Aeneas, who is the symbol of the soul. Nothing can be more laboured than the way in which Bernard pursues this allegory; and yet when we are inclined to credit the commentator with less than an ordinary measure of common sense, we are bound to remember that he was but applying to other literature principles of exegesis which until a recent time were considered valid in reference to the Bible. Bernard's Glossules may indeed be taken as a good argumentum ad absurdum for the entire method of allegorising; but in regard to the author they only show the reverence he bore towards the poets before Christianity, and the anxiety with which he sought to discover in them glimpses into the mystery of nature and to draw forth their meaning, rich with lessons for his own and every age. For ³*we are*, he would say, as dwarfs mounted on the shoulders of giants, so that we can see more and further than they; yet not by virtue of the keenness of our eyesight, nor through the tallness of our stature, but because we are raised and borne aloft upon that giant mass.

¹ Cousin, fragm. philos. 2. 348-352.
² Ibid. p. 350: cf. Joh. Salisb. policr. viii. 24 pp. 685 sq.

³ Ap. Joh. Salisb. Metalog. iii. 4 pp. 855 sq.

In this reverent dependence on the ancients lies therefore the main peculiarity of the school of Chartres. Learning, Bernard took it, was the fruit of long and patient thought, careful study of worthy models, and a tranquil life free from distracting circumstances. In his own words, ^mMens humilis, studium quaerendi, vita quieta,

Scrutinium tacitum, paupertas, terra aliena,
Haec reserare solent multis obscura legendo.

ⁿ Ap. policr. vii. 13 p. 454.

CHAP. IV. Grammar, the necessary staple of a school, was thus to be a discipline as well as a technical acquirement. Now we have to bear in mind that in the middle ages boys learned grammar, that is Latin, not commonly as an accomplishment or piece of training, but as an indispensable vehicle of communication. Fluency more than depth was required, and elegant scholarship was nearly unknown. To meet this demand therefore it was usual for the schoolmaster to drill his boys simply in books of rules and abstracts. Priscian, Donatus, and Alcuin supplied the common text-books, and the classical authors, if heard of at all, were only heard of through delectuses. Bernard's method was a protest directed against this hurried, unintelligent system. He maintained that grammar was the basis of all culture and must be learned slowly, leisurely, thoroughly; above all it must be gathered from the classics themselves, and not from all authors alike, but from the best authors.

* Metalog. i. 24 pp. 780 sqq.

° Cf. Hauréau, comptes rendus. ubi supra, pp. 75 sqq.

1145-1153.

¶ De mund. univ. i. 31 55, p. 16.

¶ Metalog. i. 5 p. 745.

ⁿ John of Salisbury has given a large and most interesting picture of what he found in practice under Bernard's eye. ^o The master himself had then retired from the work of the school, probably in order to devote himself exclusively to study; his book On the Universe was not written until years later, ^p during the pontificate of Eugenius the Third. ^q Gilbert de la Porrée was now chancellor, but Bernard's real successors were his disciples, William of Conches and Richard l'Évêque. But Bernard still took an interest, if not an actual share, in the school; and the influence of his conversations at least, whether in refectory or cloister or garden, is impressed upon a number of passages in John of Salisbury's writings. In the account to which we have referred, it is the choice of reading that stands out as the salient characteristic of Bernard's method, and marks it as CHAP. IV.

 aiming at a totally different level of excellence from that which had hitherto been deemed sufficient. The primary rudiments of the art were certainly not neglected. The pupil went through all the routine of metaplasms, schematism, and figures of speech; but this was only the groundwork. As soon as possible he was introduced to the classical texts themselves; and in order to create a living interest in the study, Bernard used not merely to treat these grammatically, but also to comment freely upon them. He would point out for instance how the style of prose differs from that of verse, so that what are vices in the one may be even counted virtues in the other. Nor did he confine himself to the form of what was being read; he was still more anxious to impress upon his pupils its meaning. It was a principle with him that the wider and more copious the master's knowledge, the more fully will he perceive the elegance of his authors and the more clearly will he teach them. For in them, explains John, the bare material is so refined and perfected by knowledge drawn from every possible source that the finished work appears in some sort an image of all arts. . . . Ransack Virgil or Lucan, and whatever philosophy thou profess, thou wilt find there its quintessence. This method of illustration, of bringing all forces to bear upon one's subject, is noted by the same writer as characterising Gilbert de la Porrée, the most famous scion of the Chartres school. *He used, says John, the help of all sciences, as the matter demanded; for he knew that the general consists, by mutual service, in the particular*¹³.

¹³ Utebatur, prout res exigebat, omnium adminiculo disciplinarum, in singulis quippe sciens auxiliis mutuis universa constare: Historia pontificalis xii p. 526. The authorship of this invaluable record, which was published for the first time by Dr Wilhelm Arndt in Pertz' twen-

CHAP. IV.

Bernard carried out his system in a way that suggests the routine of a much later age. He set his boys, or young men (for if John of Salisbury's case be typical, the course was rather that of a university than of a school), to do daily exercises in prose and verse composition, and prepared them by explaining the qualities in the orators or poets which they should imitate; his great rule being that they should be brought up on the best models and eschew the rest. Among the virtues of the grammarian, says John, the ancients justly reckoned this: to be ignorant of some things. The pupils passed round their copies of verses for one another to correct, and the healthy friction helped to keep up the stimulating influence of their master. Nor was composition the only practice which they were given. They had also to learn by rote and every day keep a record of as much as they could remember of the previous day's lesson; for with them the morrow was the disciple of yesterday . . . After this wise, adds John of Salisbury, *did my preceptors, William of Conches and Richard, surnamed the Bishop, now by office archdeacon of Coutances, a man good both in life and conversation, instruct their pupils awhile. But afterwards, when opinion did prejudice to truth, and men chose rather to seem than to be philosophers, and professors of arts undertook to instil the whole of philosophy into their auditors more quickly than in three or even two years,—they were overcome by the onset of the unskilled crowd and retired*¹⁴. Since then less time and tieth volume in 1868, may be regarded as settled by the considerations brought together by Dr von Giesebrecht in the Sitzungsberichte der philosophisch-philologischen und historischen Classe der königlichen Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 3. 125 sq.; Munich 1873.

The ascription is now allowed by J. C. Robertson, Materials for the Life of Thomas Becket 4. 261 n. 2; 1879.

¹⁴ I have commented on the interpretation of this passage, which has been generally misunderstood, infra, Appendix vii.

less care have been bestowed on grammar, and persons who profess all arts, liberal and mechanical, are ignorant of the primary art, without which a man proceeds in vain to the rest.

CHAP. IV.

For 'albeit the other studies assist literature, yet this has the sole privilege of making one lettered.

^r Cf. Metalog. i. 27 pp. 777 sq.

A competitive system such as that John refers to, was a natural result of the 'intellectual restlessness of the time. The aim of the school of Chartres was directly opposed to this. Grammar, according to Bernard, was not to be treated as a mere technical study, as an instrument to be used in philosophy or theology: it was an end in itself. In a word he endeavoured according to his lights to substitute for grammar philology. The level to which he attained may appear to us very imperfect; but we have at least this testimony to his success, that John of Salisbury, his pupil, wrote indisputably the purest, if not the most graceful, Latin of the middle ages. He has a taste in style and a breadth of reading for which no previous period has prepared us. The idea of learning which he reveals is something quite different from what we meet with in the preceding centuries, whether in the eleventh, in the verbose inanities of 'Anselm the Peripatetic, or even ^t v. supra, pp. 81 sq.

^r Cf. cap. 3 p. 741.

at the close of the ninth, in the childish unconsciousness of saint Notker Balbulus, himself an inmate of the renowned monastery of Saint Gall, which was at that very time the beacon of learning for middle Europe. The latter, after discoursing at length ^u Of the famous Men who have expounded the holy Scriptures, thinks it necessary to say a word about secular literature. For the rest, he says (he is writing to Solomon, afterwards bishop of Constance), if thou desirest to know also the authors of the gentiles, read Priscian. Moreover, the histories of ^u De illustr. viris qui s. scripturas exponebant sub fin., Pez. Thes. anecdd. noviss. i (1) 14.

CHAP. IV. Josephus the Jew and of our Hegesippus should be read. And I set an end to my book. Amen.

From what has been said of Bernard's conservative temper, and of the way in which he held aloof from the popular wrangle of dialectical controversies, it may fairly be surmised that his school did not attract so great a number of pupils as some other schools which had sprung up with the dialectical movement, and which devoted themselves to the novel vogue. Such, as we shall see, were those of Melun, and of Saint Geneviève, and the Petit Pont at Paris. At the same time we may reasonably infer that Chartres attracted a distinctly higher class of students than these, at least after the retirement of William of Champeaux, and the death of the brothers of Laon. John of Salisbury may again be called as witness. After two years under famous dialecticians at Paris, he was glad enough to spend three more under the masters of Chartres. The teachers he names in this connexion are William of Conches and Richard l'Évêque: a third distinguished disciple of Bernard, Gilbert de la Porrée, who was then resident at Chartres, John did not attend as a master, so far as we know, until later. These successors of Bernard illustrate the tendencies of his teaching in several ways; but it is remarkable that only one of them, William, and William only in a modified degree, can be regarded as Bernard's heir in what we take to be his special characteristic, namely his indifference to, if not his negation of, theology as a branch of scientific study.

* Metalog.
i. 5 p. 745.

William of Conches is ranked after Bernard * as the most accomplished, opulentissimus, grammarian of his time. As Bernard commented the Aeneid, so did he the Timaeus of Plato, and on the same principles. With him, as with Bernard and with John of Salisbury, the rules of speech which comprise grammar, dialectic, and rhetoric, and are together included under the name of eloquence, are the first things which the philosopher must possess: with them equipped, as with arms, we ought to approach the study of philosophy, first as learned in the sciences of the Quadrivium, and finally in theology, *since by the knowledge of the creature we attain to a knowledge of the Creator*¹⁵. But the basis of the whole is grammar: in omni doctrina grammatica praeedit. This is the mark of the school of Chartres; and it is unfortunate that William's comprehensive work, the Philosophia, remains a fragment at the end of the fourth book just at the point where he is about to introduce the characteristic subject. Hence we know the author principally as a natural philosopher, it would be more accurate to say, as a cosmologer; and in this quality his writings are a good sample of the freedom of thought that issued from the classic calm of Chartres.

Bernard had found in his philosophy an adequate explanation of all the phaenomena of life, ethical and metaphysical as well as physical: and William was his true disciple; but with this difference, that he expanded the definition of philosophy so as to include theology. His views on this subject, there can be no doubt, he derived almost exclusively from the writings of Abailard; but if he was only a theologian at second hand, this was because his interest was still confined to

¹⁵ Philosophia iv. 41 Hon. p. 1020 F. The work to which I refer under this title I quote either from the edition printed as the work of Honorius of Autun, in the twentieth volume of the Lyons Max. Biblioth. Patr., 1667, or from that to be found among Bede's works, vol. 2, in the edition of Basle 1563 folio; which recensions I cite respectively as Hon. and Bed. On the various intricate questions relating to William's bibliography see below, Appendix v, vi.

CHAP. IV. the outward facts of nature. He borrowed from theology just so much as was necessary to elucidate the genesis and order of the universe, and beyond this he did not care to go. For the same reason he parted company with the realists before accepting that doctrine of ideas which others found the most attractive feature in Platonism. Alike in his ^acommentary on Boëthius' Consolation of Philosophy, a work of a comparatively early date, and in the ^a*Dragmaticon* which he wrote long afterwards with an avowedly apologetic purpose, we find the same reluctance to admit conclusions which, he plainly felt, did not belong to his proper field of enquiry. His business was with the external and tangible. The root of his system is disclosed in the sentence above quoted: By the knowledge of the creature we attain to a knowledge of the Creator. Nor was this any but a legitimate application of the habits of thought current in the schools of the time. Realism no less than nominalism, as Theodoric and Bernard are witness, had its ^binevitable issues running counter to the accepted religion: yet the realists as a rule were disposed rather to compromise Christianity in favour of Plato than to loose hold of the universal truth of their philosophical theories. William of Conches treats the two authorities as practically coördinate, and, with the one exception to which we have referred, confidently adapts his interpretation of the letter of Scripture to the principles which he had learned, through whatever indirect channels, from Plato. ^c*The wisdom of the world*, he repeats, is foolishness with God: not that God esteems the wisdom of this world to be foolishness, but because it is foolishness in comparison of his wisdom; nor does it follow on that account that it is foolishness.

^a v. Jourdain. not. et extr. des manusc. 20 (2) 54 n. 3.
^a v. infra, p. 129.

^b Cf. tr. de gener. et spec., Cousin, ouvr. inéd. d'Abél. 517, 1836; Rémusat 2. 97 sqq.

^c Philos. i. 19 Hon. p. 999 E.

William therefore seeks God through nature: he proves his existence from the good design and government of the world, and scruples not to find an explanation of the mystery of the Trinity quite other than that which is sanctioned by the fathers of the church. *There is, he says*¹⁶, *in the Godhead, power, and wisdom, and will, which the saints call three persons, applying these terms to them by a sort of affinity of meaning, and saying that the divine power is Father, the wisdom Son, the will the holy Ghost. . . . The Father, he continues, begat the Son, that is the divine power begat wisdom, when he provided how he would create things and dispose them when created: and since he provided this before the ages, before the ages he begat the Son, that is, wisdom; and this of himself not of another, because not by the teaching of another nor by experience, but of his own nature, he had this knowledge. From the time he was (if it be lawful to say it of eternity), from that time he knew these things, nor was there any else to know them. If therefore he is eternal, his wisdom also is eternal. Thus the Father begat the Son, cœternal with him and consubstantial*¹⁷. In another place^d William expressly rejects the notion that Eve was created out of Adam's rib, as a crabbed, literal interpretation. How, he asks, are we contrary to the divine

^d Philos. i. 23; infra, append. vi. § 6.

¹⁶ Est igitur in divinitate potentia, sapientia, voluntas: quas sancti tres personas vocant, vocabula illis a vulgari per quandam affinitatem transferentes; dicentes potentiam divinam patrem, sapientiam filium, voluntatem spiritum sanctum: Philos. i. 6 (Bed. 2. 312; Hon., p. 998 A). Cf. infra, Appendix vi. § 6.

¹⁷ Pater ergo genuit filium, id est, divina potentia sapientiam, quando providit qualiter res crearet et creatas disponderet: et quia ante secula hoc providit, ante secula filium, id est, sapientiam, genuit; et hoc ex se non ex alio, quia neque alicuius doctrina neque usus experientia, sed ex propria natura hoc scire habuit. Ex quo autem fuit (si fas est dicere de aeterno), ex eo [edd. quo] haec scivit, nec [al. non] fuit qui [al. quin] ista sciret. Si [al. Sic] ergo aeternus est, et [al. quia] sapientia eius aeterna est. Hic [al. Sic] pater genuit filium coaeternum sibi et consubstantialem: Philos. i. 8 Bed. 2. 313. I add in the last three sentences the variants from Hon. p. 998 c. In one case I have conjectured an emendation.

CHAP. IV. *Scripture, if concerning that which it states to have been done, we explain the manner in which it was done*¹⁸ ?

Such independent utterances not unnaturally made William an object of violent dislike to his more cautious or more pious contemporaries. His works are full of complaints of his detractors. He accounts for the opposition he met with, as the venom of envious rivals : *Because they know not the forces of nature, in order that they may have all men comrades in their ignorance, they suffer not that others should search out anything, and would have us believe like countrymen and ask no reason ; so that now the word of the prophet should be fulfilled, The priest shall be as the people. But we say that in all things a reason must be sought, and if it fail we must confide the matter, as the divine page declares, to the holy Spirit and to faith*¹⁹. These envious monks, however, *if they perceive any man to be making search, at once cry out that he is a heretic, presuming more on their cowl than trusting in their wisdom*²⁰. William takes them to be altogether the same class of teachers who compounded for the slenderness of their knowledge by the pace at which they could carry their pupils through the whole of philosophy. *He is never tired of inveighing against these glib smatterers.

At length, however, as he advanced in years, William ¹⁸ Nam in quo divinae scripturae contrarii sumus, si quod in illa dictum est esse factum, nos qualiter factum sit explicemus: Hon. p. 1002 E (Nos I supply from Bed. 2. 318).

¹⁹ Sed quoniam ipsi nesciunt vires naturae, ut ignorantiae suae omnes socios habeant, nolunt eos aliquid inquirere, sed ut rusticos nos credere nec rationem quaerere; ut iam impleatur propheticum, Erit sacerdos sicut populus. Nos autem dicimus in omnibus rationem esse quaerendam: si autem alicui deficiat (quod divina pagina affirmat) spiritui sancto et fidei est mandandum: ibid.

²⁰ Si inquirentem aliquem sciant, illum esse haereticum clamant, plus de suo caputio praesumentes quam sapientiae suae confidentes: ib., p. 1002 F.

* v. infra, append. vii.

came to see that there was this justice in the objections raised against him on the score of orthodoxy, that even though every doctrine he maintained was capable of defence, he had erred in the novelty of the terms in which he had stated them. Some time after John of Salisbury had quitted Chartres, William of Saint Thierry, the prime mover in the final attack on Abailard, 'detected the danger that lurked under the innocent form of Conches' Philosophy. It was enough, he said, to have had a new theology to extirpate in the case of Abailard, without the addition of a new philosophy²¹. He wrote a strenuous letter on the subject to Bernard of Clairvaux; and the influence of the autocratic saint conspired, it seems, with the hostility which William of Conches had excited among rival teachers, to determine the latter to withdraw from the wrangle of the schools. His Norman birth perhaps helped to find him protection in the household of Geoffrey the Fair, count of Anjou, who was now in occupation of Normandy, and who had himself endured the edge of saint Bernard's vigorous denunciation²².

To this prince William addressed a new edition of his Philosophy, rewritten in a more docile spirit, and distinguished from the earlier book by its dialogue form. He confesses in it 'the errors and omissions which experience had discovered to him in the work of his youth, imperfectum, utpote imperfecti, and is resolved to make ample amends by striking out not only things contrary to the catholic faith, but also every-

CHAP. IV.
 'Ep. ad Bern.
 de error.
 G. de Conch.,
 B. Tissier,
 bibl. patr.
 Cisterc. 4.
 127-130,
 166a folio.

'Dragmaticon, praef.,
 pp. 5 sq.:
 cf. infra append.
 iv. 2.

²¹ Etenim post Theologiam Petri Abaelardi Guillelmus de Conchis novam affert Philosophiam, confirmans et multiplicans quaecunque ille dixit: Ep., ubi supra, p. 127.

²² 'Comes Andegavensis, malleus bonorum, oppressor pacis et libertatis ecclesiae,' says Bernard in a letter assigned to the year 1141: Ep. cccxlviii. 2, Opp. i. 317.

CHAP. IV. thing at all connected with it which, though capable of defence, might savour dangerously of novelty. It was better, he felt, to be silent than to risk the possibility of falsehood. His former work, therefore, he suppressed, and begged everyone who possessed the book to join him in condemning and destroying it. Not words, he protested, make a heretic, but their defence. It is a strange commentary on his judgement, and on the criticism of William of Saint Thierry, that the work thus disowned should have lived to be printed in three several editions as the production of the venerable Bede, of saint Anselm's friend, William of Hirschau, and of Honorius of Autun; the taint of heresy plainly cannot have been long perceptible to medieval librarians²³. Nor, indeed, was the change that transformed the Philosophy into the Dragmaticon a very extensive one: substantially the two books are for the most part the same. To the ideology of Plato he had never committed himself: now he takes the opportunity of emphasising his correct position with respect to a pitfall over which, in fact, he had never stumbled²⁴; in such matters, he says, Christianus sum, non academicus. He remained a Platonist so far as the external and rational elements of the philosophy were concerned, but he went to orthodox theology for the rest.

^h Dragm.
vi. p. 306.

It is likely that the moderation with which he had learned to express his views restored his credit in the ²³ I do not know whether it has been remarked that the author of the Dragmaticon was naturalised by English students as William Shelley: see below, Appendix vi. 5.

²⁴ The Dragmaticon, or Dialogus de Substantiis physicis, has been carefully analysed in an interesting paper by professor Karl Werner, in the seventy-fifth volume of the Sitzungsberichte der philosophisch-historischen Classe der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Vienna 1873. See especially pp. 400 sqq.

eyes of the stricter churchmen. Certainly his Dragmaticon enjoyed a remarkable popularity, and a wide diffusion attested by a multitude of manuscripts at Vienna, Munich, Paris, Oxford, and other places. The favour in which he was held by Geoffrey Plantagenet we know only from William's own scanty notices, and there is no reason for assuming it to have been lasting. Whenever he left his patron, it is natural to conjecture that he settled in Paris, where he is related to have died apparently in 1154²⁵. We thus arrive at the probable kernel of truth in the old tradition which has been constantly repeated from du Boulay, Oudin, and the other literary historians, and which makes William from first to last a distinguished figure in the 'university' of that city²⁶. The meagre facts thus elicited concerning the philosopher's external biography are abundant in comparison with those recorded of his colleague at Chartres, Richard l'Évêque, whose virtues as a man and a scholar are celebrated in no ordinary terms by his pupil and friend, John of Salisbury. Richard, so far as is known, left no memorial as a writer. Unlike William he advanced from teaching to the active service of the church; he became

CHAP. IV.

²⁵ The year is perhaps conjectural. It occurs under the notices of 1154, but with the prefix 'hoc tempore,' and only in the chronicle of Alberic, called of Trois Fontaines, who died nearly a century later: Bouquet 13. 703 D; 1786.

²⁶ Dr. Schaarschmidt who was the first, I think, to combat this theory, is inclined, Johannes Saresberiensis 22, to question William's connexion with Paris at any time. The epitaph however, or rather the panegyric, upon him, which says, Eius præclaret natu Normannia, victu

Francia, Parisius corpore, mente polus, is stated to have been the composition of Philip Harveng, abbot of Bonne Espérance, who died perhaps thirty years after William: Du Boulay, Historia Universitatis Parisiensis 2. 743. It appears indeed that M Charma disputes this evidence and discovers the philosopher's grave in a village near Évreux: see Hauréau, Singularités historiques et littéraires 266. This, if proved, would be a welcome solution of a vexed question.

¹ Metalog. ii. 10 p. 804, &c.

CHAP. IV. archdeacon of Coutances, and finally in ^k 1171 bishop of Avranches. The situation of his ministry brought him also into connexion with the house of Anjou, and it was his city of Avranches that witnessed the reādmis^k Hist. litt. 14. 215 sq.; 1817.
 A.D. 1172 sion of Henry the Second to the communion of the church after the murder of Thomas Becket. He died in 1182, the last survivor of the masters of Chartres.

Gilbert de la Porrée has a more important place in the philosophical history of the age even than William of Conches, partly because his studies lay in departments of learning to which a greater relative weight was attached than natural philosophy or grammar. A contemporary panegyrist proclaims him lacking in no one of the seven liberal arts, save only astronomy²⁷; but in sober history he appears as a theologian and a dialectician. In dialectics he holds in one way a quite unique position; for his Book of the Six Principles, a supplement to the Categories of Aristotle, was accepted through the middle ages as second only in authority to the works of the founder of logic (among which, both in manuscript and print²⁸, it held its place until the Latin versions of Aristotle were exchanged in general use for editions of the Greek), and it was made the basis of extensive commentaries by Albert the Great and several other schoolmen. Gilbert is thus the first medieval writer who was at once taken as a recognised authority on logic, as the immediate successor of Boëthius and Isidore; for Alcuin's Dialectic, although a very popular text-book, had only been admitted as a convenient summary, and had by this

²⁷ Temporibus nostris celeberrimus
 ille magister, Logicus, ethicus hic, theologus
 atque sophista,

Solaque de septem cui defuit as-tronomia:—Du Boulay 2.736.

²⁸ I have used the Venice folio of 1489.

time been rendered practically obsolete by the higher proficiency which was now expected of logical students: and even if Gilbert's treatise is hardly worthy of its reputation, it undoubtedly indicates a remarkable advance in the notions men had of scientific necessities, that anyone should venture to complete a section of a work of so unapproachable an eminence as Aristotle's Organon. CHAP. IV.

If dialectics made Gilbert's lasting fame, theology was the rock upon which his fortunes were nearly shipwrecked. He is the one man whom saint Bernard of Clairvaux unsuccessfully charged with heresy. This singular experience may be conveniently treated in another connexion; at present it will suffice to notice the few facts which are known about his life. Born in Poitiers about the year 1075²⁹, he left his native city to become successively the scholar of ¹Bernard of Chartres and of the illustrious Anselm of Laon³⁰. It was doubtless the attraction of the former teacher that recalled him to Chartres, where he settled and was made chancellor of the cathedral. After perhaps twenty years of this life he removed to Paris, and gave lectures in dialectics and theology. He did not, however, stay long in the capital, being appointed ^mto an office in the church of Saint Hilary at Poitiers. It is hard to believe that he abandoned the ambitious sphere of Paris in favour of this provincial preferment without some serious reason, and one's suspicions are aroused ²⁹ John of Salisbury writing of the year 1148, speaks of Gilbert as one who 'circiter annos 60 expendat in legendo et tritura litteraturæ:' Historia pontificalis viii. Pertz 20. 522.

³⁰ M. Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique 1. 448, rightly exposes the error by which Otto of Freising describes Hilary of Poitiers as Gilbert's first master. Saint Hilary was in fact the father to whose writings Gilbert constantly professes himself peculiarly indebted.

¹ Otto Fris. de gestt. Frid. i. 50 p. 379.

^m Hist. litt. 12. 467. A.D. 1141.

CHAP. IV.

ⁱ Gaufrid.
vit. s. Bern.
nardi v. 15,
Bern. opp. 2.
1122 F.
ⁱ 1 epist.
xviii. 84.

by the circumstance that ⁱ Abailard, when approaching condemnation at the council of Sens, is said to have turned to Gilbert with the line of Horace, ° Tunc tua res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet.

Gilbert must therefore have already been pointed at as a fellow-heretic with the victim of Sens. The presage, as the sequel shows, proved true; and prudence may therefore have determined his withdrawal from the focus of publicity to the quiet post of scholasticus at Poitiers³¹. He retired into his native country just as Abailard had done under like circumstances, and for the time he was rewarded, for in but a year the bishop's see became vacant, and was filled up by his own elevation.

A.D. 1142.

It was four years after his preferment that the crisis of his life came. A charge of heresy which was brought against him occupied and perplexed the deliberations of two successive councils; and to this day it is debated whether he was condemned or acquitted. It will suffice for the present to observe that the visible result of the latter council was that the bishop returned untouched to his diocese, where for the few years remaining to his long life he ruled in peace. ⁱ He died in 1154. The fact that his alleged crime related to the detail

A.D. 1148.

ⁱ Rob. de Monte chron.
a. 1154 Pertz
6. 504.

³¹ A pretty letter from Gilbert to his old master Bernard is printed in the Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, 4th series, i. 461. Although in the transcript from which it is edited the names appear only in initial, there can be absolutely no doubt about its attribution. Its date moreover seems to me fixed by the sentence, 'Quamvis etenim mihi in Aquitanie partibus scolas regenti, hilari vultu fortuna irrideat, eo tamen dolore unice singulariter torqueor quoniam a tam praeclari

doctoris presencia abesse compellor.' There is more than a hint here of the difficulties that caused Gilbert to retire to Poitiers. As for his affection for Bernard 'quicquid boni,' he says, 'quicquid prosperitatis, quicquid scientie dominus mihi vel concessit vel concessurum opinor, denique quicquid sum, tibi post deum attribuo, tibi adscribo.' Another letter by Gilbert, but one of purely ritual interest, is printed after dom d'Achery by Mabillon, Annales O. S. B., 6. 343 sq.

of theological metaphysics takes it out of the atmosphere of that school of which we have attempted to discern the peculiar elements. His theology is a legacy not from the teaching of Bernard of Chartres, but from Anselm of Laon, who, ¹ we know, had suggested, though he did not countenance, at least one of the theses which brought Gilbert into trouble ³². It is also necessary to bear in mind that the latter would in all probability never have attracted hostile notice, had not the extreme spiritual party first tasted blood in the person of Abailard. Ignorance, prejudice, an incapacity of criticism, coupled the two men together; and Gilbert suffered from the tail of the storm which had overwhelmed Abailard.

CHAP. IV.

¹ Jo. Salisb.
hist. pont.
viii. p. 523.

³² A special point of connexion between Anselm and Gilbert lies in the fact that the latter wrote a series of glosses in continuation and extension of his master's Glossa interlinearis et marginalis, itself a supplement to the standard Glossa ordinaria of Walafrid Strabo. 'Considerato quippe magistri Anselmi Laudunensis glossandi modo, quod videlicet nimia brevitatem non nisi ab exercitatis in expositionibus patrum posset intelligi, glossam proximam eoque evidentiorum fecit.' Appendix to Henry of Ghent, De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, cap. viii., A. Miraeus, Biblioth. eccles. 174, Antwerp 1639 folio. Gilbert thus became a joint author of what was practically the authorised body of notes on the Bible current in the middle ages. His 'glosatura' on the Psalms (cod. coll. Ball. Oxon. xxxvi, Coxe, Catal. Codd. MSS. Coll. Oxon. 1. 11 a), 'quam ipse recitavit coram suo magistro Anselmo,' appears to have been held in particular esteem: cf. Alberic, a. 1149, Bouquet 13. 702 B; Robert de Monte, a. 1154, ibid., p. 297 c; William of Nangy (who also refers to Gilbert's comments on the Pauline epistles), ibid., vol. 20. 736 B. See too du Boulay 2. 734 (who accidentally writes Petri for Gilberti), and the Histoire littéraire de la France 10. 181, 12. 474.

CHAPTER V.

PETER ABAILARD.

CHAP. V. WITH Abailard we turn again to the schools of dialectic, but Abailard is much more than a dialectician. He is the commanding figure in the intellectual history of his age,

^a Epitaph. ii, sub fin., opp. 1: 717, ed. Cousin.

^a Cui soli patuit scibile quidquid erat.

^b Sic et non, prol. p. 17, ed. E. L. T. Henke et G. S. Lindenkohl; Marburg 1851.

It is his general attitude towards the study of philosophy and of theology that demands our examination, far rather than those technical points in which he was suspected of departing from catholic Christianity. If he was, as he consistently maintained, the devoted son of the church, he was none the less a herald of free thought by virtue of his bold assertion of the duty of private judgement and his contempt of those who take everything on trust. ^b By doubling we are led to enquire; by enquiry we perceive the truth: this is the method which Abailard professes. It is not that he doubts that the two roads, of reason and authority, must ultimately converge: only he will not start from any but the direct questionings of his own mind. Self-reliance is his special characteristic. It shows itself in his personal history even more than in his writings, so that his entire life is an exemplification of the force of a Titanic personality in revolt against the spirit of his time.

Abailard¹, like so many of the great men in the earlier middle ages who have been given the highest place in the literary history of France, was not a Frenchman. He was born² in Britany, at ^cPalais, or Pallet, in the neighbourhood of Nantes. Although the eldest son of a good house, he early abandoned his birth-right to his brothers and resolved to make himself a name in learning. He became a pupil, ^d*discipulorum* ^d*minimus*, of Roscelin, the daring nominalist whose doctrine was condemned in its theological issues by the council

CHAP. V.

A.D. 1079.
c Hist. calamitatum
i. opp. i. 3 sq.

^d Rosc. ep. ad Abael.,
Abael. opp. 2. 794.

¹ With reference to the name, it is hardly necessary to say that from the first its spelling fluctuates. In the editions it is commonly normalised as Abäelardus; the diphthong is altogether a modern invention, disproved by every case in which it occurs in verse. On the whole it seems that Abaielardus is the earliest form. This appears, e.g., in the facsimile of the Munich manuscript of the Sic et non given at the end of Henke's edition, as well as in Otto of Freising (ed. Pertz) and John of Salisbury (in his Historia pontificalis), although the former alternates with Abaiolardus. Of the Paris manuscripts of the thirteenth century, edited by Cousin in the Ouvrages inédits d'Abélard, one gives Abailardus (intr. p. viii.), the other two Abäelardus (see the facsimile facing p. 434). Other rare forms need not be quoted, some of them are uncouth enough; but the fact that the initial a was frequently dropped (see an instance below, Appendix viii.) may be taken as evidence of where the accent lay. It was natural that the word should become softened in common use; and Abailardus and Abäelardus were no doubt practically undistinguishable in pronunciation. I select the former, partly because it approaches nearest to the original (though it needs no apology even to the French, since it is accepted in Firmin-Didot's Nouvelle Biographie générale), partly because it avoids those associations with eighteenth-century sentimentalism which surround the name of Abélard and obscure the philosopher's true significance. The popularity of this last spelling seems to date from its selection by Pierre Bayle in his Dictionnaire historique et critique, s. v.

² For the biography my principal guide has been Abailard's own correspondence, though this has necessarily to be taken with reserve. Besides the contemporary literature, I have derived very great help from the biography of Charles de Rémusat, the first piece of genuine scholarly work ever devoted to Abailard. Still it should be observed that Bayle, in the article above referred to, has the credit of first introducing order into the narrative of Abailard's life; in which respect Milman, for instance, History of Latin Christianity 4. 342-365, is not seldom far less trustworthy. From all the authorities—Cousin, Ritter, Hauréau, and Prantl should be added—I have ventured to differ seriously in my general estimate of Abailard's character. While preparing this and the following chapters for the press I have had the advantage of reading professor S. M. Deutsch's Peter Abälard, ein kritischer Theolog des zwölften Jahrhunderts; 1883.

CHAP. V.

of Soissons in 1092, but who appears to have submitted to the sentence and to have been allowed to hold a scholastic post either in the monastery of ^aLocmenech, now Locminé, near Vannes, and not far distant from Abailard's home, or else (for ecclesia Locensis is ambiguous) at the church of ^fSaint Mary of Loches in the neighbourhood of Tours. Roscelin, if we are to give credit to an old ^glegend, soon excited a spirit of resistance in his pupil, and in a year Abailard left the school. After spending perhaps a short time at ^hChartres, where he attempted in vain to acquire the rudiments of mathematics,—though this experience possibly belongs to a later period in his career,—he made his way to Paris, to the cathedral school, where his master was the representative realist, William of Champeaux.

The abruptness of the transition from Roscelin to William, the extreme views held by the two masters, may explain how it was that Abailard set himself in turn to combat the logical position of both; but his subsequent career sufficiently shows how little inclined he was under any circumstances to subject his intellect to the authority of a teacher. The nominalistic principles which he had learned from Roscelin, he took with him to Paris and used with signal effect against the hierophant of realism. He at once aspired to the rank and influence of an acknowledged master, but the not unnatural hostility of William seems to have prevented his opening a school in Paris itself. The history of the relations of the two rivals is like John Scot's account of logic; it was a flight and a chase, ⁱ*quaedam fuga et insecutio*. The same city was not large enough to hold them both. Abailard therefore began by teaching at some distance from Paris, in the royal fortress gesch. d. log.

^a Prantl.,
im abendl. a.
77 n. 314.

^f Hauréau, singul. hist.
et litt. 228.

^g V. infra,
append. viii.

^h Ibid., sub fin.

ⁱ Heric. Au-tissiod. gloss.,
ap. Cousin,
fragm. philos.
2. 320.

of ^{*}Melun; he soon ventured a little higher up the Seine, to Corbeil. But the severity of his studies had told upon his health, and he was forced to take rest. For a few years he lived in seclusion, possibly with his family in Britany; but so soon as his strength was recovered he hastened again to Paris.

CHAP. V.

^{*} Hist. calam.
ii. pp. 4 sq.

By this time William of Champeaux also had withdrawn from the active work of the cathedral school and buried himself in the priory of Saint Victor. But the pressure of his friends had not left him long in his religious leisure: he was now lecturing at Saint Victor on the old subjects, and Abailard was once more found among his auditory, less a pupil than a critic. Abailard pressed the master with objections: he boasts that he compelled him to seek a new formula for his logical theory³, and the success of this feat made the adventurous disputant for the time the hero of the schools. He set up a school for himself; he was even invited by William's successor at Notre Dame to take his place. But William, though at Saint Victor, was not out of hearing of what went on in the city. He did not risk a personal encounter with Abailard, but attacked him through the master who had offered him a post of so dangerous an authority. The too compliant master was disgraced, and Abailard judged it prudent to transfer his school to his old quarters at Melun. Soon, however, William for other reasons also quitted Paris. Abailard was at once on the spot. He established himself upon

³ The exact nature of this change is doubtful on account of a various reading in the manuscripts of the Historia calamitatum, in respect to which Cousin, Fragments philosophiques 2. 115 sqq., and Rémusat, vol. 1. 20, adopt a different judgement from that now generally received, e.g., by Ritter, Geschichte der christlichen Philosophie 3. 358, by M Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique 1. 337 sqq., and by Dr von Prantl, vol. 2. 129 sq. Dr Deutsch however, p. 103 n. 2, adduces powerful arguments in support of the opinion of Cousin and Rémusat.

CHAP. V. the hill of Saint Geneviève within a short distance of the city, and determined to brave the consequences. When William once more returned, it was too late. His old fame as a teacher was almost forgotten, while Abailard's position was secured by a crowd of pupils whom the novelty and brilliancy of his discourses had fascinated into the sturdiest of partisans. Such at least is Abailard's account, which, coloured as it undoubtedly is by prejudice and avowed animosity, we have no means of contradicting from other sources. William indeed seems to have given up the long contest: after a while he was glad to subside into the quiet of a bishoprick.

The qualities by which Abailard won his unequalled popularity were not only a native gift for exposition, not only a singular ¹ lucidity and plainness of statement so different from the obscure formalism usually inseparable from the handling of logic; but also an originality of thought which enabled him to make a serious revolution in the philosophical theory of the 'art.' ² Traces of conceptualism there certainly are long before Abailard's time. We may find them in the ninth century in the glosses of Heric of Auxerre, if not in Rabanus Maurus: ³ in the eleventh the doctrine reappears in Berengar of Tours. But Abailard, though not the creator, was not the less the principal organiser and, for his own age, the founder of the school which lies intermediate between those of his two first masters. The system which he produced, if it was eclectic, was certainly nearer nominalism than realism: he conceded in fact the affirmations of both sides while denying the correctness of their negations. The main tenet of the nominalists, the absolute existence of the individual,

¹ Cf. Jo. Salisbury. Metalog. iii. 1 p. 840.

² Cf. infra, append. iv.

³ Cf. supra, pp. 98-103.

he accepted; but he did not rigidly limit existence to that which is open to the senses. Genera and species, the categories and predicables, he refused indeed to endow with essence as things; they had no actual existence apart from the individual: nor was the universal, as William of Champeaux held, contained in its entirety within the particular. The process was the other way; it was from the particular that we arrived at the general by an effect of thought. On the other hand if the universals, if abstractions of all sorts, were the creations of the intellect, they were also its necessary creations; they were therefore so far real that the human mind could not do without them. In the same way Abailard found no difficulty in the universalia ante rem, the universals considered as anterior to the sensible world; since they might equally be conceived in relation to the mind of God as to our own. The Platonic world of ideas was thus to be understood as existing in God's creative thought⁴.

Abailard's conceptualism was probably the most reasonable among the many proposals of his day which sought to frame a logical theory free from the revolutionary tendencies of Roscelin's nominalism, and yet better adapted than the elder realism to the more subtil and critical habits of thought to which men were now training themselves. It was virtually a return to the position of Aristotle, and in Abailard's case it is all the more remarkable because his direct acquaintance with the master was limited to the earlier treatises of the

⁴ See generally Rémusat 2. 119 sqq., Hauréau 1. 380 sqq., Schaarschmidt, Johannes Saresberiensis 319 sqq. The exposition of the two former writers, as well as that of Cousin, vol. 2. 160-197, is partly vitiated by the stress they lay on the treatise De generibus et speciebus, the authorship of which is more than doubtful.

CHAP. V.

° Schaarschmidt 70.

° Ibid., pp. 120 sq.

° Cf. Prantl 2. 162.

° Cf. l. c., pp. 38 n. 147, 76 n. 312.

*Organon*⁵; he had therefore to °discover, to divine, for himself the issues to which Aristotle tended. From his time, probably through his immediate influence, the authority of the Greek logician grew uninterruptedly until the decline of the middle ages, and there is a strong presumption that °it was to the active encouragement of his pupil John of Salisbury that western Europe was indebted for a translation of the rest of the Organon. Within a century it possessed almost the whole of Aristotle in a Latin shape. Accordingly it is not surprising that Abailard's permanent reputation was founded upon his dialectical eminence. The °title of Peripatetic, by which he is regularly styled in John of Salisbury's writings, indicates this distinction, for the name had by this time acquired the same special meaning as °sophist had two or three centuries before, though it was already being superseded by the more accurate term *dialectician*⁶.

But Abailard was not contented with his reputation; he would not have his faculties circumscribed in a single field. He had an immense energy of mind, a restless ambition to dominate other minds; and in his age supremacy was only attainable by adding a mastery of theology as a key-stone to unite and perfect the structure, in itself incomplete, of human knowledge. Nor would it be just to deny the natural significance

⁵ How many is disputed. Schaarschmidt, pp. 70, 120 (cf. p. 305), says—I think, rightly—nothing beyond the Categories and the De interpretatione, with the Isagoge of Porphyry: Dr von Prantl however, vol. 2. 100–104, maintains that Abailard's knowledge extended to the Prior Analytics; and Cousin, in his later edition, Fragments

philosophiques 2. 53, is inclined to admit both the Analytics and the Topics, but with the qualification 'sinon une traduction de ces ouvrages, du moins tout ce qu'avait écrit sur ce sujet Boèce.'

⁶ Peripateticis, quos nunc dialecticos appellamus: Abael. Theol. Christ. iii. 1, Opp. 2. 448.

of the connexion in which Abailard himself relates this passage in his life. He left his school on Saint Geneviève in order to visit his home in Britany and to 'take leave of his mother who was about to withdraw into a nunnery. I came back to France, he says, principally that I might cultivate divine learning,—maxime ut de divinitate addiscerem. He found his way clear before him: William of Champeaux was now bishop of Châlons, and Abailard might look with hopefulness to a career of influence in the future undisturbed by the evil eye, as he deemed it, of his enemy; rivals he had long ceased to fear. Nevertheless the impression made upon him by that last interview with his mother—we cannot misread the words, although the inference appears to have escaped the notice of his biographers—had taken so fast a hold of his mind that, even in the auspicious situation of affairs ready prepared, one would say, for him in Paris, he could not bring himself to break a solemn resolve. He passed through the capital and presented himself, this mature philosopher of four and thirty, as a disciple of the illustrious Anselm of Laon.

Abailard has so much faith in himself that he describes every incident in his life as the result of careful planning; he leaves no room for emotion or sudden inspiration⁷: and yet it is these very rapid transitions in his mind that determined the crucial events which give his history so marked an individuality. 'His self-confidence,—if we will, his vanity,—was opposed by an irresolution, an infirmity of purpose, which was no less characteristic an element in him. He surrendered his

CHAP. V.

* Hist. cal.
ii. p. 7.* Cf. Deutsch
50 sqq.

⁷ Rémusat, vol. i. 49, has made another incident in Abailard's life, a similar remark in connexion with on which see below, pp. 146 sq.

CHAP. V. prospects in obedience to a religious impulse: doubtless he may have foreseen a wider potentiality of sway in the new field to which he betook himself; still for the moment he sank from the dignity of a famous teacher to the level of his own pupils, some of whom he perhaps might meet as fellow-scholars in the lecture-room at Laon. But it was one thing to form a resolution, another to have the courage or the humility to carry it out; and as a matter of fact Abailard's impatience of authority soon reasserted itself. He sat at the feet of a master whom he felt to be his inferior, and he despised him. Anselm's language, he says, "was wonderful, but its sense was contemptible and void of reason. He kindled a fire not to give light but to fill the house with smoke." Truly the genius of the two men lay in exactly opposite directions. Anselm was an erudite theologian, great in the 'case-law' of the fathers, believing what 'was written' and daring not to add to it. Reason, which to Abailard was the highest gift of man and therefore of the widest applicability, Anselm could treat as impotent in theology, just because it was a human faculty; as such, the things of God were beyond its competence. It is evident that the spirit in which Abailard approached the study was precisely the spirit which would be likely to lead to suspicion and danger in the twelfth century.

* Hist. calam.
iii. p. 7.

* Ibid., capp.
iii, iv, pp.
7 sq.

His disgust with the "barren fig-tree" whose delusive attraction had enticed him into visiting Laon, very soon became too strong for him to be able to continue his studies there. He ridiculed the notion that one could not learn theology without a master, and provoked a challenge to put forth a specimen of his own skill. His fellow-students warned him against the temerity, but he would not be restrained. He gave an exposition upon Ezekiel which, he tells us, so delighted his hearers that those who first came only from curiosity were joined in the subsequent lectures by a press of diligent students. Anselm was very wroth: his head-pupils Alberic of Rheims and Lotulf the Lombard⁸, urged upon him the duty of interdicting a course of procedure which from being unauthorised was viewed almost in the light of rebellion. To the indignation of the rest of the scholars who had been glad enough to exchange the formal, if weighty, instruction of their old master for lectures into which Abailard threw all the energy and fresh vigour of his intellect, the course was suppressed; the interloper judged it wise to return to Paris. His stay at Laon had only proved to him in his own mind, that no learning, no eminence, was beyond his power: envy, he said, expelled him: rivalry was now out of the question.

⁷ Abailard's reception at Paris confirmed his self-conceit. The former enmity there had vanished; only his reputation was remembered. He was made, it seems at once, a canon of Notre Dame⁹: he resumed his lectures

⁷ Hist. calam.
v. pp. 8 sq.

⁸ Otto of Freising gives the name as Leutald or, as it appears in the newest (Dr R. Wilmans') edition, Letald, of Novara: De gestis Frederici i. 47 Pertz 20. 377. No doubt 'magister Luitolfus' in Gerhoh of Reichersperg, ep. xxi Migne 193. 576 c, is the same person.

⁹ One can hardly be mistaken in this surmise; yet it is curious that Abailard is never actually spoken of as a canon of Paris, while different records seem to give him this dignity at Tours, Chartres, and Sens. The last notice is explicit; it occurs in the manuscript chronicle of Geoffrey de Collone of Sens and is as follows: 'Petrus Abaulart, canonicus primo maioris ecclesie Senonensis, obiit; qui monasteria sanctimonialium fundavit, spetialiter abbatiam de Paraclito, in quo sepelitur cum uxore. Suum epitaphium tale est:

Est satis in titulo: Petrus hic iacet Abaillardus.

Huic [cod. Hic] soli patuit scibile quidquid erat.

Canonicus fuit et post uxoratus.' Rémusat who gives these facts, vol. i. 39 n., is uncertain whether Abailard held one office after the other, or whether there was by possibility a distinction of honorary canon.

CHAP. V. and became again the most popular teacher of his day¹⁰.

While he was thus in the zenith of his career fate suddenly turned against him : he quitted the cathedral and entered the religious life in the abbey of Saint Denys ; for the future he would be dead to the world. The circumstances of this crisis are familiar to all readers, whether of history or romance ; and incalculable mischief has been done equally by the solemn reproofs of the one, and the sentimentalities of the other, class of writers. Abailard himself, our sole informant of the particulars of his love for Heloïssa, was a man whose self-reliance, as we have said, required that every act of his should seem to be a skilfully-devised link in a consistent chain of policy ; he almost writes as if to persuade us that from the outset he deliberately planned his mistress's ruin¹¹. To those who read his words with a deeper perception of his character, and much more to those who go on to the long correspondence and the life-long interdependence of ¹⁰ It was at this time, I am persuaded, with Cousin, vol. 2. 208 sqq., that Abailard wrote the Sic et non. A collection such as this, of contradictory opinions from the fathers on nearly all the principal points of theology, is just what an ambitious lecturer on the subject would prepare for his own use. I am not so sure that Abailard intended that it should pass beyond the esoteric company of his immediate friends and disciples. My view of the date is perfectly compatible with the presumption raised by Dr Deutsch, pp. 462 sq., that the prologue to it, naturally the last part of the composition, was written about the year 1121.

¹¹ A recent biographer of saint Bernard has committed himself to the monstrous theory that Abailard began this stage in his career by a course of indiscriminate debauchery, and afterwards paid court to

Heloïssa in obedience to a craving for a more select form of gratification ; 'he required some delicacy of romance, some flavour of emotion, to remove the crudity of his lust :' J. Cotter Morison, Life and Times of saint Bernard, 296 ; 1863. The single basis for the former part of this hypothesis, which is contradicted by Abailard's express statement, Hist. calam. v. p. 9, is a letter by Fulk, prior of Deuil (Abael. Opp. i. 703-707), whose rhetorical flattery, and whose professed aim of consoling Abailard, cannot conceal the brutality of his satire : he is in fact merely retailing and magnifying whatever idle calumnies were current about Abailard among his enemies, besides adding not a few from his own gross imagination. The second part of Mr Morison's theory is of such a kind that one can hardly bring oneself seriously to consider it.

Abailard and Heloïssa, such an explanation will appear not merely inadequate but incredible. Abailard's account, written moreover under the oppression of enduring remorse, is too highly coloured by these mixed feelings to be taken as it stands: his interpretation of his error, or his guilt, is misleading. In the words of his wisest biographer, * 'he deceives himself; a noble and secret instinct bade him love her who had no equal: ' and the same instinct kept the two in spiritual union, however far apart their lives might run, until the end. CHAP. V.

* Abailard privately married Heloïssa; but this step, a concession to the wishes of her family, was powerless to avert their vengeance. Here we must carefully observe that the marriage was in no wise thought of as an act unbecoming or forbidden to a clergyman. From Abailard's own writings we learn that he would be ready with arguments for such a case. The lower clergy, he held¹², were free to take wives so long as they were not in charge of a parish. He appealed to the established usage of the Greek church, to the exceptional privileges granted the newly-converted English by Gregory the ciliengeschichte 5. 410 n., 419 (1863); Deutsch 453-456. In the present instance, however, I am persuaded that the manuscript, which is all through a very bad one, is seriously corrupt or else that the student misunderstood the lecturer. The words are, 'Utrum clerici matrimonium contrahere possint, quaeri solet. Sacerdotes qui non fecerunt, possunt.' Rémusat, vol. 2. 249 n. 2, is disposed to understand vota with fecerunt; but the passage goes on to forbid marriage to any order above that of acolyte. Should we read funt instead of fecerunt? — 'Those who do not become priests, may marry.' But this only removes half the difficulty.

¹² The passage is in the Sententiae, cap. xxxi, published under the title of Epitome theologiae Christianae by F. H. Rheinwald, Berlin 1835, p. 91 (or in Cousin's edition of the Opera 2. 582). The work is in the main a summary of the Introductio ad Theologiam, but unfortunately the place in question comes from a portion of the Introductio which is now lost. There is a general agreement among scholars that the Sententiae, although almost certainly not the production of Abailard himself, are notes taken by a disciple from his lectures, and that they may be used with comparative confidence: see Rheinwald's preface, pp. xxvi-xxviii; Rémusat 2. 188, 243 sq.; Hefele, Con-

CHAP. V.

Great, in proof that celibacy was a law of expediency (and thus less or more restricted at different times and places), not one of universal obligation. Accordingly we do not find that either he or any one else objected to his marriage on this ground: it is certain that he was in orders, because he was a canon; but it does not appear that he was even as yet a subdeacon. When ^bHeloïssa argued against the proposal and urged the examples of gentile philosophers who remained unmarried in the interest of their labours, unbound as they were by any profession of religion, and concluded, What does it become thee to do who art clerk and canon?—the reasoning is simply that if marriage be an impediment to a philosopher's labours, how much more must it affect one with a religious obligation; but there is no hint of any further obstacle.

^b Hist. calam. vii. p. 14.

No doubt Abailard injured his position by his action; possibly ^che might be conceived to be thereby disqualified from the functions of a theological teacher: but more it would be improper to assert. If there was any prejudice raised against him on this account it was quickly silenced when Fulbert, his wife's uncle, revenged himself with savage violence upon the invader of his home.

^c Rémusat i. 63.

^dFulbert, the champion of virtue, had to flee: his victim ^ewas supported not only by the sympathy of his disciples and the clergy at large, but even by that of the canons and of the bishop of Paris himself. It was not then Abailard's marriage that set a period to his career as a teacher in Paris; it was the shock of the personal outrage to which he had been subjected and which it was a heavy task to survive. His honour in the city was in fact unimpaired, perhaps augmented: but the thread of his life was broken. He had no longer heart to continue his lessons: ^fhe withdrew in bitterness to ^d Hist. calam. vii, viii, p. 16.

^e Fulcon. epist., Abael. opp. i. 706 sq.

^f Hist. calam. viii. pp. 17 sq.

Saint Denys ; his wife found shelter in the convent of Argenteuil. CHAP. V.
C. 1119.

But Abailard found no rest in the abbey. The disorder, the loose manners, of his fellow-monks turned the religious quiet of the place into an uproar more jarring than the noise of the outer world. Abailard raised his voice in vain against the desecration ; at length he was permitted to remove to a cell in the country of Champagne. He had now rallied from his misery. The pressure of his former scholars roused in him again his old energy. He was once more a teacher, thronged by students of the arts whom it was his ambition to educate to the pursuit of true philosophy, in other words, of theology. He would be another Origen. ^sTheology, however, as he had learned at Laon was a dangerous profession unless the teacher had well authenticated credentials. To established masters, to ^hAlberic of Rheims and Lotulf of Novara, Abailard was an adventurer, all the more sternly to be suppressed because his popularity was draining their schools. They strained every nerve to effect his overthrow. But, to do them justice, it was not mere envy that prompted their opposition. Abailard's was a perilously exciting personality. His nature (this is a principal charge which ⁱOtto of Freising makes against him) was too restless to endure subjection to any master. He committed himself to controversy with each successively, and such was the defiant and contemptuous tenour of his argument that he made enemies of them all. The very qualities which delighted his pupils, his dogmatism, his brave assurance, were just those which irritated his elders and contemporaries. In earlier years William of Champeaux had done everything in his power to keep his rival away from Paris : now it was

^s Ibid., cap. viii. p. 18.

^h V. supra, p. 145.

ⁱ De gest. Frid. i. 47 pp. 376 sq.

CHAP. V. Abailard's oldest master, the nominalist Roscelin, now closing his troubled career as a canon of Saint Martin's at Tours, who renewed the attack.

Abailard had indeed taken no pains to conceal his opinions. He had but recently published a work *On the divine Unity and Trinity*¹³, which appeared to his critics to contain grave errors with respect to the cardinal doctrine: for this he was to be called to account. Roscelin, eager no doubt to demonstrate his own innocence of a heresy for which he had suffered nearly a generation previously, and which he may have recognised as the object of certain pointed references in the new book¹⁴, came forward as the champion of the faith. He disseminated a rumour against Abailard's orthodoxy.

¹ Opp. 2. 1 sq.

^k The latter reported the calumny to the bishop of Paris in a letter couched in language of indecent violence against his assailant. He reminded the bishop of Roscelin's past history and of the notorious contumely with which it had been attended. He also wrote, but the letter has not been preserved, in similar terms to Roscelin¹⁵. ¹ Roscelin had his answer; in vituperation he

¹ Epist. ad Abael., Abael. opp. 2. 792-803.

¹³ That this Tractatus de unitate et trinitate divina is the work that remains to us under the title of Theologia Christiana, is made probable by the minute examination of H. Goldhorn, in the Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie 36 (30, of the new series) 161-229, Gotha 1866. Dr Deutsch, however pref., p. v. maintains, I think with good reason, that the Theologia is not identical with, but a new edition of, the Tractatus. Previously the work has been considered to be identical with the Introductio ad Theologiam: see Rémusat, 1. 75 (cf. pp. 81 n., 88 n.), Cousin, Abael. Opp. 2. 1 sq., and Hefele 5. 321 n. 1.

¹⁴ At least such expressions are plainly given in the Theologia

Christiana and in the Introductio ad Theologiam, which are on all accounts enlargements of the earlier work and in all probability follow its lines pretty closely in the part where they deal with the same subject.

¹⁵ This I infer without hesitation from the fact that while Roscelin's rejoinder keeps pretty closely to the lines of Abailard's extant letter, it also animadverts in set terms upon some expressions not to be found in it. Everything moreover contradicts Cousin's notion, Abael. Opp. 2. 792, that Roscelin's letter drew forth that of Abailard to the bishop: for the latter, as appears from its beginning, is an answer not to a specific letter but to a report which Roscelin had circulated; while was a match for his scholar: but possibly the taint attaching to his name prevented the affair from being carried further. The actual blow came from Rheims, where those same masters, Alberic and Lotulf, who had long before procured the discontinuance of Abailard's informal lectures at Laon, now presided over the cathedral school. In the seven or eight years that had passed since then they had risen to an influential position¹⁶.

^m They aspired to be the successors of Anselm and William of Champeaux, and their authority stood high in the counsels of Rodulph the archbishop of Rheims. The latter they prevailed upon to arrange with the papal legate, Conan, bishop of Palestrina, the assembly of a council to enquire into Abailard's errors: and so it came about. Abailard was tried before the council of Soissons in 1121, and he was condemned.

Of the details of this transaction it is difficult to judge. Our principal witness is Abailard himself, and it would be too much to expect impartiality from one who suffered as he felt unjustly. ⁿ The charge against him was

CHAP. V.

^m Hist. calam. ix. p. 18.

ⁿ Otto Fris. l. 47 p. 377.

Abailard's countercharges are all presupposed in the letter of Roscelin. The discovery of this letter, it may be added, has finally settled an old controversy with reference to the authenticity and motive of Abailard's, and remarkably confirmed the prior arguments of Duchesne, Abael. Opp. i. 50 sq., and Rémusat, vol. i. 81 n. 2. Hitherto it had naturally been questioned whether Roscelin could be alive at so late a date. The new fact has been skilfully applied to fill in the detail of his biography by M. Hauréau, Singularités historiques et littéraires 222-230, who had already discovered Roscelin's name (Roscelino de Compendio) among the signatories to a deed at Saint Martin's, Tours, about the year 1111, Gallia Christiana 14, instrum. 80 D; 1856.

¹⁶ See the verses commemorating Alberic in the Life of Adelbert the Second, archbishop of Mentz, by Anselm, bishop (as it is supposed) of Havelberg, ver. 599-606, Jaffé, Bibliotheca Rerum Germanicarum, 3. 586; 1866. Part of it describes the master as follows:

Qui nova pandendo, set non antiqua silendo,

Littera quae celat vetus aut nova scripta, revelat,

Dogmatis immensi dux primus in urbe Remensi,

Testamentorum pandens secreta duorum,—ver. 603-606.

For another sign of the regard in which Alberic was held, see the extract given above, p. 78 n. 27.

CHAP. V.

- that he had imported his nominalism into the domain of theology. Since the time °when Roscelin first opened the subject, the mystery of the Trinity had offered dangerous attractions to the students of logic. But how Abailard was supposed to touch the doctrine it is impossible to say. ° He himself tells us that the accusation was the same as a previous council at Soissons had brought home to Roscelin: namely that he taught the existence of three Gods. If such were the charge it were easy enough for Abailard to answer it. ° Roscelin had but now reproached him with precisely the opposite view; and no language can be clearer or more precise than that of his extant works (and ° there is nothing to lead us to suppose that he changed his opinions in any material point), in which ° he declares the substantial unity, the singleness, of the divine nature: ° where, he says, there is only a substance entirely one and individual, there is no plurality of things. His real difficulty was to reconcile this absolute being with the tripersonal nature of God: and ° Otto of Freising is probably right in asserting that the charge against him was that, nimis attenuans, Abailard effaced the discrimination of the three Persons, which the church held to be not mere names but distinct things with separate properties; in other words that he held, as ° Roscelin had already insinuated, the proscribed tenet of Sabellianism, that the three Persons are the three aspects by which God reveals himself to us, Power, Wisdom, and Love (or Goodness).

There is no doubt but that the description is partially just. ° Abailard confesses that the attempt to prove the diversity coexistent with the unity, is one that baffles human reasoning. Philosophical terms are not merely inadequate to the expression of the supreme truth; ° they ° Cf. supra, pp. 103 sq.

° Hist. calam. ix. p. 19.

° Epist. ad Abael., Abael. opp. 2. 796.

° Cf. Deutsch 265.

° Theol. Christ. iii. opp. 2. 471; intr. ad theol. ii. ibid., pp. 85-88.

° Intr., l. c., pp. 87, 88, cf. lib. i. p. 11; Theol. Chr. iii. p. 476.

° Loc. cit.

° Epist. ad Abael., Abael. opp. 2. 798, 801.

° Theol. Chr. iii. p. 477, intr. ii. p. 87.

° Intr., l. c., pp. 88-93; lib. iii. p. 115.

are inapplicable to it. We are forced to use words in a special sense, to resort to metaphors and similitudes in order to bring it home to our understanding. It is true that the *illustrations and analogies which Abailard brought forward, to give, as it were, a glimpse of that which transcends thought, were liable to be perverted as though he intended them to be accurate representations of the truth itself: but setting aside this mistake, for which ^b there is little justification in his book, if we read it as a whole and do not pick out single sentences, there is no doubt that the main thesis may be, and has often been, held by orthodox Christians, who make a distinction between the essential nature of God and the forms by which we perceive it: and it has generally been held that, if imperfect, the doctrine is not necessarily heretical. Nor can it be doubted that it was not really Abailard's results that formed the strength of the indictment against him, but the method by which he reached them. His book On the Trinity has not certainly come down to us, but if it contained that sentence, which we know rankled in the minds of his judges at a future trial,—A doctrine is not believed because God has said it but because we are convinced by reason that it is so,—this might surely be sufficient to combine the entire forces of the traditionalists to oppose him ¹⁷.

It is, however, needless to speculate upon the right or wrong of the case, since ^c Abailard was by all accounts

CHAP. V.

^a Ibid. ii. pp. 93-100, 101 sqq., 108.

^b Cf. Rémusat 2. 304-343 (especially pp. 330 sq.), 381 sq.

^c Otto Fris. i. 47 p. 377; Abael. Hist. calam. ix, x pp. 18-22.

¹⁷ Nec quia deus id dixerat creditur, sed quia hoc sic esse convincitur recipitur: Intr. ad theol. ii. p. 78. Compare the context, and Otto of Freising's report of the sentence on Abailard at the later council of Sens, De gest. Frid. i. 48 p. 377, which reproduces the language addressed, no doubt, by saint Bernard to pope Innocent the Second in the name of four of the prelates there present: 'Petrus Abaelardus Christianæ fidei meritum evacuare nititur' &c., Bern. Epist. cxci, Opp. i. 184 c. A good statement of Abailard's position in regard to reason and faith will be found in Hefele 5. 412-415.

CHAP. V. condemned unheard; there was no attempt, certainly no serious attempt, made at the trial to understand or confute him. If any step in this direction was taken, his superior knowledge and dialectical skill immediately drove his opponents back upon their material defences, the strong arm of the archbishop of Rheims and of his docile chief, the papal legate: ^dAbailard mercilessly exposed their vaunted championship of orthodoxy as involving commonplaces of heresy long ago exploded by the arguments of the fathers. Accordingly, although he had submitted his book to the jurisdiction of the council, with a promise that if there were anything in it that departed from the catholic faith, he would correct it and offer satisfaction, no one ventured to examine it; argument was the last weapon on which his opponents were willing to rely. Bishop Geoffrey of Chartres therefore, certainly the most respected among the prelates of Gaul, seeing that there was no chance of a candid enquiry at Soissons, proposed an adjournment to a more learned tribunal to be assembled at a future date at Saint Denys. The motion was agreed to, and for an instant Abailard had hope. But the legate was soon persuaded that a postponement would be a virtual admission of weakness. It was represented to him that Abailard's book was condemned by the very fact of his having presumed to lecture in public without the authorisation of the Roman pontiff or of the church; it must therefore be officially consigned to the flames as a warning to others. Bishop Geoffrey made stand no longer. He sorrowfully advised Abailard to yield: this violence, he said, could only recoil on the heads of its perpetrators and assist the cause which it was intended to destroy. The book was burnt and its author was committed to the custody of the abbat of Saint Medard. CHAP. V.

^d Hist. calam. ix pp. 19 sq.; cf. cap. x p. 22.

Abailard was not long held in confinement. His sentence had become, *he says, a public scandal; and his restoration to Saint Denys was less an act of grace than a device for burying the consequences of the trial. But Abailard's second stay in his own monastery was as distasteful to him as the first. His unlucky discovery in the pages of the venerable Bede that saint Denys, the Areopagite, the patron of the foundation, was bishop of Corinth and not of Athens, as maintained by the tradition of the abbey¹⁸, brought matters to a crisis. The brethren assembled in solemn session, denounced the audacious statement, and threatened its perpetrator with further proceedings before the king. Abailard deemed it wise to flee; he made his way by night into the country of Champagne. But he could not always be a fugitive; he desired in no way to release himself from the obligation of his monastic vow, only to be free to exercise his own choice as to where he should live. To obtain such permission it was necessary to propitiate his religious superiors, whose irritation was hard to avert. †He explained in vain that he had discovered that the statement of Bede was outweighed by the superior authority of Eusebius and others¹⁹. At length

* Hist. calam. x pp. 23 sqq.

† Epist. de Dionys. Areop., opp. i. 682-686.

¹⁸ Saint Denys was no doubt bishop neither of the one place nor of the other, but of Paris; but this Denys was not the Areopagite. Abailard's critical sagacity seduced him from the popular story, and he gladly accepted the first alternative he found. Still that the question arising with regard to the different persons who bore the name of Dionysius, can by no means be considered as settled may be gathered from the different articles in Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography i. 841 b, 842 a, 848 b, 849.

¹⁹ Dr Deutsch, pp. 38 sq., satisfactorily excuses Abailard from the charge of sacrificing his own opinions to expediency; the only question is, whether he concealed the evidence of Eusebius previously in order to irritate the monks of Saint Denys.

CHAP. V.

the appointment of a new abbat of Saint Denys, the famous Suger, simplified the case, and Abailard was suffered to become an unattached member of the house. He withdrew to a solitude in the neighbourhood of Troyes, possibly the same retreat whither he had gone on the occasion of his previous departures from Saint Denys²⁰. There with a single companion he set up a hut of wattles and thatch, an oratory in the name of the holy Trinity. But it would certainly be a mistake to think that he now purposed to lead the tranquil life of a hermit. ² Need, he says, forced him to teach; but it was not merely to supply his physical sustenance: his active brain must else have succumbed in the wild monotony of his new abode. No doubt he published the seat of his future lessons before he set out for it. At all events it was no sooner known where the master was than the story of his former sojourn in the same locality repeated itself. A concourse of students followed him, and the solitude was turned into an encampment. Abailard regained his old spirits. A school grew up ² Hist.

calam. xi
p. 26.

²⁰ The first time 'ad cellam quamdam recessi,' cap. viii. p. 17; the second 'ad terram comitis Theobaldi proximam, ubi antea in cella moratus fueram, abcessi,' cap. x. p. 24. These two are therefore the same; and the latter notice is brought into connexion with Privignum (Provins). Abailard's third visit was 'ad solitudinem quamdam in Trencensi pago mihi antea cognitum,' ib., p. 25. It seems natural to infer that the places were in the same neighbourhood, and this is certainly the old tradition. William Godell, who wrote as early as about 1173, expressly says that Abailard established the Paraclete on a spot 'ubi legere solitus erat,' Chron., Bouquet 13. 675 B, C; and the statement was evidently widely circulated because it occurs in substantially the same words in the Chronologia of Robert of Auxerre, Bouquet 12. 293 E, 294 A, and in the Chronicle of Saint Martin's at Tours, ibid., p. 472 C. Bayle's objection to this record, Dict., s. v. Paraclet, n. A, vol. 3. 592, that Abailard did not teach there until after he had built the oratory, is therefore removed by the identification with the seat of his previous teaching. I notice that William of Nangy in repeating the story, Chr., sub ann. 1141, changed legere into degere. So at least the text runs in the received edition, Bouquet 20. 731 D, 1840: Duchesne however read legere here as well, note xlv. to the Hist. calam., Abael. Opp. i. 63.

about him, and the little oratory became the centre of a huddled mass of cabins and tents. Abailard rebuilt and enlarged it, and consecrated it afresh to the Paraclete, the Comforter of his hard-pressed life. He had the same learned ardour as ever; but more and more his secular teaching is becoming a necessity, not a chosen task; more and more he is growing absorbed in the study of spiritual things.

Was it this very fact, was it his presumed intrusion upon a field where only those who have not lifted up their mind unto vanity may dare to tread, that made this change in Abailard's life a signal for a renewal of suspicion against him? From this time, ^h Abailard says, ^h Ibid. xii. pp. 28 sq. he had to fear the slanders, the machinations, of the two men who boasted themselves the reformers of the religious life;—saint Northbert the new apostle of the regular canons, saint Bernard, of the monks;—the one the founder of the Premonstratensian order, the other of the abbey of Clairvaux. Abailard's fear is the only evidence of its cause. At the time when he dwelt upon it he had not to our knowledge come into personal conflict with either²¹: the day when Bernard should be his judge at the council of Sens was yet far distant; in 1131 indeed he is found in friendly association with the abbat on the occasion of a high solemnity, in the presence of pope Innocent the Second at Morigny near Étampes²². ^{Jan. 20, 1131.} Still the presentiment of evil was so strong

²¹ Bishop Hefele, vol. 5. 401, thinks that Abailard's reference to Bernard is an error of memory, but the critic forgets that Abailard had, so far as we know, no more reason for thinking of him when he wrote the Historia calamitatum than at the time of which he speaks. At least there is no evidence of the date of the composition of Abailard's letter to saint Bernard, Opp. i. 618-624, or of the latter's treatise De baptismo aliisque quaestionibus, of which we conceive Dr Deutsch, pp. 466-472, to have proved that Abailard was the object.

²² The names actually follow one another in the list of the notable that Abailard meditated escaping altogether from the lands of Christendom and living alone, a blameless outcast. Soon, however, a middle path opened to him. About the year ¹1125 the abbacy of Saint Gildas de Rhuys in Britany became vacant: doubtless through his connexion with that country, he was summoned to assume the dignity. The invitation furnished the release he was seeking; and he gladly betook himself to the desolate coast, preferring to live among people of barbarous manners and strange speech, rather than to encounter daily suspicion of his beliefs on subjects which were now to him most sacred of all.

CHAP. V.

For a course of years then, probably six or eight²³, persons present: Bernardus abbas Clararum Vallium qui tum temporis in Gallia divini verbi famosissimus prædicator erat; Petrus Abailardus, monachus et abbas, et ipse vir religiosus, excellentissimarum rector scholarum, ad quas pene de tota Latinitate viri litterati confluebant: Chronicum Mauriniacense, sub anno, Bouquet, 12. 80 c; 1781.

²³ I incline to the shorter period. Rémusat, vol. i. 163 n., says that Abailard's departure from Saint Gildas 'fut antérieure à 1136 et probablement de plusieurs années.' Elsewhere, p. 139 n., he is disposed to place his removal from Britany (some time after the final rupture with the monks) in 1134. But it must be borne in mind that the entire correspondence between Abailard and Heloïssa belongs to this interval. The latter first wrote when she had 'by chance' had a sight of Abailard's Historia calamitatum, composed in his retirement after, probably just after, he had quitted Saint Gildas; and we must allow some time for the news to have reached her. Moreover a correspondence of eight letters such as we possess supposes a considerable length of time. The last dates given in the Historia calamitatum are (1) the confirmation of the charter of the Paraclete by Innocent the Second, cap. xiii. p. 31; and this was on the 28th November 1131 (see the instrument, Opp. i. 719 sq.): and (2) a legation from the pope to enquire at Abailard's request into the abuses at Saint Gildas, which we may reasonably conjecture was arranged during Innocent's visit to Gaul, October 1130-March 1132 (see Jaffé's Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, pp. 562-568, Berlin 1851), and probably at the time, January 1131, when Abailard was in the pope's company at Morigny. Either we must be content to leave a blank interval of four or five years before Abailard reappears on Saint Geneviève, or else suppose him to have endured the intolerable life of Saint Gildas for as many as eight. I think it is more natural to abridge the latter. Let it be noticed that it is only the accident of the existence of the Historia calamitatum that makes the earlier part of his life so full of events, and only the incidental notice of John of Salisbury that commemorates his continued activity in 1136. But for this single men-

¹ Rémusat
i. 120.

Abailard dwelt at Saint Gildas, though it is difficult to understand how he could have lived there at all. Never before had he suffered such hardship, such unrelieved misery. He had now no longer any teaching to take his thoughts away from external cares. He was in the hands of violent men, unlettered, unruly, of unbridled passions and degraded lusts, robbers, would-be murderers: such were the monks of Saint Gildas. Abailard had no command over them; it was enough if he could preserve his personal safety. A single incident consoled him in this terrible period of his career. The convent of Argenteuil, where Heloïssa lived as prioress, had ceased to exist. ^{}The abbat of Saint Denys had asserted on behalf of his house a legal claim upon it: he established his suit, and in ¹1128 the nuns were dispersed. The news no sooner reached Abailard than he resolved to place his wife in possession of the deserted buildings of his oratory of the Paraclete. The grant was approved by the bishop of Troyes and confirmed by pope Innocent the Second in 1131. From that day Abailard had a new interest to assuage his gloom. He visited the Paraclete frequently; he helped to remove the difficulties, even of the means of sustenance, that encompassed the infant nunnery; became the counsellor, the father, of the house. Each return to Saint Gildas made the tyranny of his own 'sons' more unendurable: ^mhe sought every means of escape but was arrested by bandits hired by them. He engaged the aid of superior powers and had a number of the brethren expelled; but the act only exasperated the rest, flight became a necessity. At length, with the protection of a neighbouring magnate he made good his ^{} Hist. calam. xiii. pp. 30 sq.

¹ Brev. Chron. eccl. s. Dion., sub ann., Bouquet 12. 215 C.

^m Hist. calam. xv. pp. 34 sqq.

tion Abailard's history from the termination of his own narrative to the council of Sens, remains a shadow.

CHAP. V. escape; but not yet to security: "he long trembled lest
 * Epist. iii., his refuge should be discovered, and he fall a victim to v., opp. i. 79, the vengeance of the monks he had deserted.
 96 sq.

It is in this pitiable situation that the History of his Misfortunes, which has been our principal guide in the preceding narrative, was written: we do not know how long the crisis was protracted, but in the end he appears to have received permission to live free of the monastery while retaining his rank as abbat. The following years are filled only with his correspondence with Heloïssa. He is now the director of the fortunes of the Paraclete: he resolves the various problems that arose in respect of ritual and discipline; his thoughts are absorbed in the details, in the routine of practical religious life, he seems to have forgotten that he had ever been a master of worldly lore and a teacher to whom all men listened. Yet in fact this period was probably one of great intellectual activity. It seems that he was now engaged in collecting and putting in order his former works, in expanding and digesting the notes and glosses that had once stood him in such good stead at Saint Geneviève or at the Paraclete. It was now, unless the indications deceive us, that he mainly wrote, or at least brought into the form in which we now have it, the treatise on Dialectic, which contains perhaps his most enduring contribution to the advance of learning, as well as that ° Theologia, distinguished by editors as the Introduction to Theology, which furnished his enemies with a weapon for his final overthrow. Abailard had indeed lost neither the desire nor the power of subduing an audience, and twice again he was found on Saint Geneviève; twice again he became the centre of the dialectical world. How it was that he recovered his popularity we have no means of knowing, but it is a plausible conjecture ^Pthat CHAP. V.

° Cf. Goldhorn, ubi supra, pp. 185-190.

the History of his Misfortunes was written not only with a ^PDeutsch view to publication, but also with the object of reminding 44 sq.
the world of the position which he had once held among teachers, and which he was resolved to hold again. In 1136, when ⁹John of Salisbury began his logical studies, ⁹ Metalog. ii.
it was to Abailard that he addressed himself; and if we 10 p. 802.
may argue from the description of a young enthusiast, the master had lost nothing of his hold upon his hearers.

He appeared as a meteor, but soon vanished: his enemies had troubled themselves little about him, so long as he remained in obscurity. For fifteen years they had made no sign; but the mere dread of attack had driven him long ago into the exile of Saint Gildas. His return to public work, and that in the immediate neighbourhood of Paris, aroused all the slumbering forces of jealousy, of personal dislike, of orthodox alarm. His formal rivals indeed were either dead or had retired from the schools: of such opposition there was no longer any risk. But a new generation had arisen, and was now in full strength, of which the chieftain was Bernard of Clairvaux, a force which maintained permanent, implacable hostility against Abailard. The immense impulse which Bernard gave to the growth of a genuinely superstitious spirit among the Latin clergy was a force with which, one sees from the outset, it was hopeless for Abailard to contend. Its principle was a blind reliance upon the traditionary authority, upon the dictates of supernatural intuition; its anathema was distinctly, irrevocably uttered against all human learning. We can however only surmise the reason which prompted Abailard, probably in 1137, to give up his lectures on Saint Geneviève. Perhaps he

CHAP. V. exaggerated the danger, it is even possible that some purely private consideration decided the step; at all events he soon returned. In 1139 he was again there, no doubt actively engaged in his old employment, when Arnold of Brescia, formerly, it is said, his scholar, now a fugitive from Italy, attached himself to him as his staunch ally and companion²⁴. After Abailard for the last time quitted the place under the circumstances to which we shall immediately turn, Arnold remained his successor on the hill until he too was forced to leave France and take refuge in the hospitable freedom of Zuerich. Arnold's adhesion, however loyal, did perhaps rather harm than good. Abailard had no doubt given offence by exposing the morals of the clergy and attacking certain abuses of ecclesiastical discipline which subserved the interests of the order rather than of society at large: but his disciple went infinitely further in denouncing all holding of property by the church and proclaiming a visionary revival of 'evangelical poverty.' The attachment of such an advocate was plainly not in Abailard's favour.

* Mabillon.
not. in Bern.
opp. i. pp.
xxxiii, xxxiv.

It seems that in 1139 *William, once abbat of Saint ²⁴ Ob quam causam a domno Innocentio papa depositus et extrusus ab Italia, descendit in Franciam et adhesit Petro Abaielardo, partesque eius . . . adversus abbatem Clarevallensem studiosus fovit. Postquam vero magister Petrus Cluniacum profectus est, Parisius manens in monte sancte Genovefe, divinas litteras scolariis exponebat apud sanctum Hylarium, ubi iam dictus Petrus fuerat hospitatus: Historia pontificalis xxxi. p. 537. John of Salisbury thus does not state that Abailard was teaching at this time; it is however a natural inference, and accepted by Dr von Giesebrecht in the Sitzungsberichte der philosophisch-philologischen und historischen Classen der königlichen Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 3. 131; 1873. Certainly Otto of Freising seems to connect Abailard's popularity as a teacher ('maximamque post se sociorum multitudinem traheret,' De gest. Frid. i. 48 p. 377) with the outbreak of hostility against him. Otto, it should be added, is ignorant of this visit of Arnold's to Paris; and it is not unlikely that his mention of him, lib. ii. 20 p. 403, as in his youth a scholar of Abailard, is really due to a confusion of dates.

Thierry near Rheims, now a humble monk at Signy, CHAP. V.
proclaimed, in a letter of passionate excitement, the horrible doctrines which he had detected in the theological works, and particularly in the new Theologia, of Abailard :

“ Petrus enim Abäelardus iterum nova docet, nova scribit. ” * Epist. ad Gaufr. et Bern., Bern. ep. cccxxv. opp. i. 302 B.
The letter was addressed jointly to his old friend Bernard and to Geoffrey of Chartres, whose influence had nearly succeeded in rescuing Abailard from the conspiracy against him at the council of Soissons, and who was now papal legate. Geoffrey perhaps had no wish to take the matter up, and Bernard delayed. After a while, however, the latter, ‘ desiring with his wonted goodness and benignity that the error should be corrected and not its author confounded, ’ * Gaufr. Clareaevall. vit. Bern. v. 13. Bern. opp. 2. 1122 ; cf. Bern. epist. cccxxvii. 2. ibid. i. 309 B. resolved to seek an interview with Abailard : ‘ so says Bernard’s devoted biographer, his ultimate successor at Clairvaux, Geoffrey of Auxerre, who adds that Abailard was so much moved by the saint’s temperate expostulations that he promised to amend his errors according as he should prescribe. The submission, however, was shortlived. Abailard appealed to the archbishop of Sens, under whose metropolitanical jurisdiction the diocese of Paris fell, and demanded an opportunity of defending his position. Geoffrey’s account indeed is plainly false, for had Abailard been guilty of this tergiversation it would, as “ Rémusat observes, not * Vol. i. 192 n. have escaped comment when the council was actually held : but there can be little doubt that the interview decided Abailard to a resolute assertion of his integrity. The opportunity he sought was conveniently chosen, for at “ Whitsuntide in 1140 the French king was about to visit Sens, and his presence would bring together a * Gaufr. v. 13 col. 1122 C ; Alan. Autissiod. vit. Bern. xxvi. § 71, ibid., col. 1267 B, C. congress of prelates to whose numbers and eminence the appellant could look with a greater probability of CHAP. V. impartial judgement than it had been his lot to meet with at his trial at Soissons. Then too he had been the accused; now he was the challenger. The difference, it seems to us, truly characterises the change that Abailard's mind had undergone through his long years of suffering and disappointment. His confidence in his absolute orthodoxy had never failed him; but now for the first time was it a pressing need to him to bring it into clear publicity.

Fifteen years earlier Abailard had seen in Northbert and Bernard the two principal troublers of his peace: a monk himself, he had enough reason to distrust and rebel against the narrow and professional tendencies of his order. Now, Northbert was dead; but Bernard was still there, and all-powerful with a large section of the religious community. It was evident in Abailard's mind that the meeting at Sens was to be a duel, but Bernard was not equally eager to engage in it. ⁷Such contests, he said, he disdained; it was not to their decision that the verities of faith were to be subjected: Abailard's writings were by themselves sufficient to convict him.

⁷ Ep. clxxxix.
4 opp. 1.
183 B.

None the less ⁸did he circulate an inflammatory letter among the prelates who were about to take part in the council. At length he yielded to the representations of his followers and made his appearance at Sens. Abailard was also present²⁵; but hardly had the council opened, hardly was the recital of his heresies begun²⁶,

⁸ Ep. clxxxvii
col. 180 F, sq.

²⁵ I am unable to substantiate the dramatic account given by Rémusat, vol. i. 204, of the mien of the two combatants, and suspect that the biographer has taken the rhetoric of Bernard, ep. clxxxix. 3, col. 182 F, 183 A, too literally.

²⁶ The order of the proceedings is somewhat obscure. In this particular I follow Bernard's letter just cited, § 4, col. 183 C: according to another, however, ep. cccxxxvii. 3, 4, col. 309 F sq., Abailard's opinions had been already condemned the day before he appealed. I should notice that all the letters printed among Bernard's works which relate to this affair, I cite as his, when, by a sudden revulsion of feeling, a failure of courage or a flash of certainty that the votes of the council were already secured,—perhaps that the excited populace would rise against him²⁷,—he appealed from that tribunal to the sovereign judgement of the Roman pontiff, and quitted the assembly.

Thus at the close of his life as at every juncture in its progress, Abailard's fortunes turned upon the alternations of his inner mood. He believed his actions to be under the mechanical control of his mind; yet he was really the creature of impulse. At the critical moment, that lofty self-confidence of which he boasted would suddenly desert him and change by a swift transition into the extreme of despondency, of incapacity for action. He fled from the council, which proceeded to condemn his doctrines with as little scruple and as little examination as the council of Soissons²⁸, but he never reached although a certain number bear the names of the collective prelates assembled at Sens, or of some of them. I make no doubt, with bishop Hefele, vol. 5. 405 sqq., that they are all of Bernard's composition, though authorised by the persons to whom they are ascribed.

²⁷ This last alternative is given by Otto, i. 48 p. 377. 'Iusticia veritus,' say two continuators of Sigebert, the Continuatio Praemonstratensis (Pertz 6. 452), one of the earliest of all our witnesses, and the Appendix 'alterius Roberti' (Bouquet 13. 331 A). Geoffrey tells us however that Abailard 'nec volens resipiscere, nec valens resistere sapientiae et spiritui qui loquebatur' (this too is the version which we find in some of Bernard's letters), had nothing for it but to appeal. He repeats a story that Abailard confessed that for the moment he lost his head: Vit. Bern. v. 14 col. 1122 D.

²⁸ Of neither council are the transactions preserved in anything approaching an official shape. Those of Sens we know from the letters of saint Bernard and from his biographers (Alan repeats from Geoffrey) who make little pretence to impartiality. On the other side we have the Apologetic of Peter Berengar, which is simply the invective of a passionate follower of Abailard: Abael. opp. 2. 771-786, especially pp. 772-776. Otto of Freising's is the account of a disinterested reporter acquainted only with the issue of the affair. I have preferred therefore to relate only the facts common to all our authorities. It is worth noticing that modern catholics are unanimous in condemning the proceedings at Soissons and materially qualify their approval of the acts at Sens: see Rémusat, i. 96 n., 218 n. 1. Dom Mabillon wrote, 'Nolumus Abaelardum haereticum: sufficit pro Bernardi causa

CHAP. V.

* Petr. ven.
epist. ad
Innoc. II,
Abael. opp.
I. 709.

July 16.

^b Eiusd. ep.
ad Heloiss., ib. p. 714.

^c Duchesne
in hist.
calam. n.
liii. p. 71.

^d Cf. Hau-réau, sing.
hist. et litt.
261 sqq.

^e Petr. ep. ad Heloiss.
p. 713.

Rome. ^aHe rested on the road at Clugny; old age had suddenly come upon him, and he had no more strength to continue the journey. In the famous abbey he stayed, resigned and softened,—anxiously making his peace with Bernard, wearily repeating his protestation of innocence to the pope, who had lost no time in ratifying the sentence of Sens²⁹,—until ^bincreasing weakness made it necessary to remove him to the more salubrious climate of Châlons on the Saône. There ^cin the spring of 1142 his troubles ended. The violence of Bernard had rid the church of a spirit too high-minded and too sensitive to outlive the injury. Whether the saint was satisfied with his success we hardly know: but this at least is certain that, except to a few zelots of the circle of Clairvaux, the impression of the sentence of Sens was entirely effaced by the renown of Abailard's transcendent learning and of his pious merit as the founder of the Paraclete, now erected into an abbey and, under the rule of Heloïssa, preëminent in honour among the convents of France. To one who watched by him in his decline, to Peter the Venerable, abbat of Clugny, himself a strenuous ^dopponent of worldly learning, the memory of Abailard retained a sweet savour, pure from any stain of malice: he was ^e*ever to be named with honour, the servant of Christ and verily Christ's philosopher.*

eum fuisse in quibusdam errantem, quod Abaelardus ipse non diffiteatur; Praef. in Bern. Opp. I. § 5. p. lv: while Bernhard Pez, the pious librarian of Moelk, judged Mabillon too severe; Thes. Anecd. noviss. 3. dissert. isag. p. xxi; 1721.

²⁹ The confirmation is printed among Bernard's epistles, nr cxciv, vol. I. 186 sq.; compare the postscript in Appendix, note 152 p. lxvi. How hard Bernard worked for this result and what scurrilities he thought proper to the occasion, may be learned from a budget of letters which he addressed to Rome, all written, I am persuaded, though Rémusat differs about some of them, after the council of Sens: Epistt. clxxxviii, cxclii (pace Mabillon's title), cxcliii, cccxxxi-ccccxxvi (the 'abbat' addressed in this last epistle is surely a Roman), cccxxxviii. I am glad to find my view supported by bishop Hefele, vol. 5. 404 sq., 409; with whom also I omit Ep. cccxxx (col. 304 B-305 B), accepting his hypothesis that it is a draught, of which Ep. clxxxix presents the final revision.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TRIAL OF GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE.

THE manifold directions in which the intellectual CHAP. VI.
movement of the twelfth century exerted itself may be judged from the issues to which it led in the case of the Platonists of Chartres and of the Peripatetic of Palais. The same free spirit of enquiry animated both alike, only by Abailard it was not repressed within the proper domain of philosophy; it was applied without fear of the results to the most mysterious, the most jealously guarded, problems of theology. His doctrine was accepted unreservedly by the realist William of Conches; and the fruits of nominalist thought were enjoyed by those whose strict principles should have taught them to reject the perilous gift. It is evident that the old distinction of the dialectical sects is fading away; and the present chapter will show us a realist whose mind was permeated by theological metaphysics, and yet whose opinions were not secure from the charge of heresy. Nominalism was indeed the immediate product of the intellectual awakening which signalised the eleventh century; but it quickly reacted upon its rival, and both parties engaged with equal vigour in the advocacy of the claims of human reason. It would of course be absurd to imagine that any of these philosophical theorists had the least idea of supplanting

CHAP. VI. the authority of the Scriptures and fathers of the church ; it was simply a matter of interpretation. Few critics will pretend that if, for example, Abailard's views threatened directly or indirectly the doctrine of the Trinity as understood by Latin Christendom, they necessarily involved a denial of the doctrine of the Bible: for men had already discovered that the Bible, like the fathers, like Augustin especially, contained the germs of all heresies, of course in various degrees, just as truly as it did of the beliefs accepted as orthodox. On this point no controversy arose in the schools; everyone agreed that the demands of reason and of authority, both rightly understood, could not but be in harmony. It was only in the heat of polemical detraction that one disputant charged another with contravening the authority of the Bible; and the charge was never in a single instance admitted: the answer was uniformly to explain how the opinions in question had been mistaken or wilfully wrested, and that in this respect conflict was impossible.

Authority, however, it must be remembered, was a very elastic term. It was generally understood as co-extensive with the church-tradition; but the uncritical habit of the medieval mind was also disposed to broaden it so as to include all documents bearing the stamp of antiquity, and we continually find the classical authors cited, even in theological treatises, with the same marks of reverence as the Bible or the fathers. Abailard himself indeed, though he might occasionally fall into the error, was far from countenancing it. *The Bible, he said, must be true; if we find difficulties in it, either the text is corrupt or we have failed to grasp its meaning: but as to the fathers, our judgement is free to accept or reject their opinions. Besides this, he drew a careful

* Sic et non, prol. p. 14, ed. Henke et Lindenkohl; cf. theolog. Christ. iv., opp. 2. 538 sq., ed. Cousin.

distinction between sacred and secular literature, and ^{CHAP. VI.} applied himself with much elaboration to establish the dignity of the latter as an indispensable auxiliary to theological studies. How, he asked, can we reject its aid when the Bible itself makes use of the books of the gentiles¹? He closely argued the whole question, quoting and rebutting every objection that seemed possible; but the conclusion at which he arrived was far more moderate than that which many masters of his day postulated. The scholars of Chartres, for instance, following their natural tastes rather than any general principles, pursued the study of natural science or of the classics quite regardless of theology: in practice they even travelled beyond the borders of Christianity, and Bernard Sylvester in his cosmology would only admit theological considerations under protest². Abailard on the contrary was inclined to accept the rule of Plato who excluded the poets from his commonwealth: 'their study, he said, however necessary as a part of education, was not to be indulged in too long³. But if the grammatical studies were chiefly valuable as a discipline, far different was his estimate of the higher branches of learning, and he

^b Theol. Chr. ii. pp. 401-413; cf. intr. ad theol. ii. ibid., pp. 62-73, & prol. pp. 2 sq.

^c Theol. Chr. ii. p. 445.

¹ I have translated 'quaedam assumpta de gentiliū libris,' Theol. Christ. ii p. 401, Intr. ad Theol. ii p. 62, according to the sense, in order to avoid the extraordinary misunderstanding of Dr Reuter, Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung im Mittelalter i. 187, that 'die seher des Alten Bundes, die apostel des Neuen haben—war die meinung—aus den werken der Hellenischen weisen entlehnt.' Abailard refers simply to quotations from the classics, not to the borrowing of opinions.

² See the phrase, which can hardly be other than contemptuous, 'si theologis fidem praebeas argumentis,' De mundi universitate ii. 5, p. 40, ed. Barach and Wrobel.

³ Dr Schaarschmidt speaks, Johannes Saresberiensis 64 sq., as though Abailard had a special proclivity to classical studies, in the way John of Salisbury had; but the passage cited in the text leads to an opposite conclusion. He had no doubt an immense interest in all literature, but I question whether his classical reading was equal to that of more than one of his contemporaries. This, I find, is also the opinion of Dr Deutsch, Peter Abälard 69.

CHAP. VI. decided that ^dall knowledge was either mediately or immediately useful and therefore to be encouraged. For learning is the vital force which multiplies a man's influence and makes it perennial. ^eSaint Paul has no greater merit than saint Peter, saint Augustin than saint Martin; yet one of each has the larger grace in teaching in proportion to his store of learned knowledge.

^d Theol. Chr. ii. pp. 443 sqq., intr. ad theol. ii. pp. 71 sqq.
^e Intr. ad theol. ii. p. 72.

Abailard laid a particular stress upon the importance of the ancient philosophy, a department in which men specially felt the need of a supplement to the Bible; and although his acquaintance with the former was, he

^f Ibid., p. 66. confesses, ^ffor the most part limited to the extracts he found in the fathers, he was not afraid to draw forth the great truth that there is a divine element in all noble thoughts, and that society has never been left destitute of divine enlightenment. ^gHe held that Plato received a revelation⁴. He accorded to him the peculiar attribute of inspired workmanship, speech by means of mysteries, needing interpretation by means of allegories:

^g Ibid., lib. i. p. 55.

^h Ibid., p. 46. ^h*for this manner of speaking is most habitual with the philosophers, even as with the prophets, namely that when they approach the secrets of philosophy, they express nothing in common words, but by comparisons or similitudes entice their readers the more cunningly.* ⁱBut for this gift Plato the chief of philosophers we should reckon the chief of fools. The principle

ⁱ Ibid., p. 48. was an old one; ^kBernard of Chartres had applied it even to the exposition of the Aeneid: but Abailard was prepared to justify it on grounds of history and ^k Supra, p. 119.

⁴ Augustin had gone no further than to explain an agreement with Christian doctrine which he found in Plato, on the supposition that the latter had either borrowed it from the recipients of revelation or else 'acerrimo ingenio invisibilia dei per ea quae facta sunt, intellecta conspexerit:' De civit. dei xi. 21, Opp. 7. 288 B, ed. Bened., 1685.

theology. ¹To him revelation was a far-reaching influence, not to be confined to the sacred records of any one nation. ²The Bible was the revelation of the Jews; philosophy of the Greeks: the two ran on parallel lines until they were embraced, and absorbed, and united in Christianity. Even the cardinal doctrine of the being of God ³*divine inspiration was pleased to unfold both to the Jews by the prophets and to the gentiles by the philosophers, in order that by it, the very perfection of the supreme good, each people might be invited to the worship of one God*⁴.

CHAP. VI.

¹ Intr. ad theol. i. pp. 28-6x.
² Theol. Chr. i. sub fin., pp. 399 sq.

³ Ibid., i. 2 p. 361; intr. ad theol. i. p. 22.

Abailard's view is more or less that of the Alexandrian Platonisers in the early ages of the church: to his own generation, however, there was something new, striking, even alarming, in the manner in which he stated it. ⁵He seemed to efface the distinction between faith and unfaith, and to treat Christian doctrine almost as a species of philosophy. Yet, even had he done so, he would only have been formulating a proposition which after all was part of the tacit, unacknowledged creed of students of philosophy. Among them the dignity of *Plato the Theologian*⁶ was certainly not allowed to suffer by comparison with the Bible. It was not merely that he furnished (by whatever crooked process of evolution) the materials for the accredited system of metaphysics: the accident that the middle ages as yet knew him

⁴ Cf. Ritter, gesch. der Christl. philos. 3. 410.

⁵ 'Haec,' says he, Theologia Christ. iii p. 450, 'adversus illos dicta sufficiant, qui suae imperitiae solatium quaerentes, cum nos aliqua de philosophicis documentis exempla vel similitudines inducere viderint, quibus planius quod volumus fiat, statim obstrepunt quasi sacrae fidei et divinis rationibus ipsae naturae rerum a deo conditarum inimicae viderentur, quarum videlicet naturarum maximam a deo peritiam ipsi sunt a deo philosophi consecuti.'

⁶ According to the distinction of Cassiodorus: Through the work of Boëthius 'Pythagoras musicus, Ptolemaeus astronomus leguntur Italis [ed. Itali]; Nicomachus arithmeticus, geometricus Euclides audiuntur Ausoniis; Plato theologus, Aristoteles logicus, Quirinali voce disceptant,' &c.: Variorum i. epist. 45, Opp. i. 20 a, ed. Garet.

CHAP. VI. only through the *Timaeus*⁷, made him also specially the authority in cosmology and theosophy. The trinity that was discovered there took the place for speculative purposes of the Trinity of the Christian church. ^p The Father and the Son became the ideal unities of Power and Wisdom, and there was a strong temptation which few were able to resist, to identify the holy Ghost with the universal Soul. Abailard indeed never went this length, ^q Otto Fris. de gest. Frid. i. 49 Pertz 20. 379.

^p Theol. Chr. i. 2 p. 361.

although ^q he was charged with the identification at the council of Sens: for himself, he consistently distinguished the third Person as Goodness or Love. But he liked to illustrate the prime doctrine by every possible analogy and was specially fond of dwelling upon the adumbrations of Christian truth which he found in Plato. ^r Plato, he says, conceived of God as of an artificer who planned and ordered everything before he made it: in this wise he considers the pattern-forms, which he calls the ideas, in the divine mind; and these afterwards providence, as after the fashion of a consummate workman, carried into effect. Such a suggestion (Abailard does not mean it as an explanation, for the truth, ^s he avers, surpasses human understanding) may help to make us guess at the relation between the Father and the Son, and of the holy Spirit to both. In the same way our theologian took the doctrine of the universal Soul, the anima mundi, as a convincing proof of his favourite position that intimations of the divine mysteries were vouchsafed to ^r Intr. ad theol. ii. p. 109.

^s Supra, pp. 152 sq.

⁷ A Latin version of the Phaedo and Meno was made, according to a manuscript of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, ccxliii. 14 & 16. (Coxe, Catal. Codd. mss. Coll. Oxon. 2, 101), by Euericus Aristippus,—no doubt the Henricus Aristippus mentioned by Hugo Falcandus, De tyrann.

Sicul., Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script. 7. 281 c,—for Maio, great admiral of Sicily, and Hugh, archbishop of Palermo. This connexion gives a date of about 1160. There is however no symptom of the translation being used until the thirteenth century. Cf. Schaarschmidt 115 sq.

the Greek philosophers. 'He seeks to show that it can be reconciled with the Christian faith in the holy Spirit; but he does not presume to identify the two ideas'. 'The former by itself, he says, is a dark saying veiled in a figure; taken literally it would be the height of absurdity: Christianity, he seems to infer, has supplied the means of solving the ænigma and bringing it into harmony with the perfect truth. Abailard's prudence was however not followed by everyone; and William of Conches, the uncompromising Platonist, who, * as we have said, seems to have borrowed a good deal from a somewhat perfunctory study of Abailard, decided without hesitation that the holy Ghost and the universal Soul were convertible terms⁸, and was only induced to withdraw the opinion by a threat and a reminder of Abailard's fate.

CHAP. VI.

⁸ Theol. Chr. i. pp. 379 sqq., intr. ad theol. i.

pp. 37-40.
⁹ Theol. Chr. i. p. 389, intr. ad theol. i. p. 48.

* V. supra, pp. 125-130.

Thus, with whatever limitations and reserves on the

⁸ In his Dialectic, Ouvrages inédits, 475, he for the first time expressly repudiates the idea; but although it had previously had an attraction for him, I cannot agree with Cousin (ibid., intr. pp. xxxiii, xxxiv, or in the Fragments philosophiques, 2. 35) that he had ever 'professed' the doctrine.

⁹ Anima igitur mundi, secundum quosdam, spiritus sanctus est. Divina enim voluntate et bonitate, quæ spiritus sanctus est, ut prædiximus, omnia vivunt quæ in mundo vivunt: Philos. i. 15, Bed. Opp. 2. 313, or Max. Biblioth. Patr. 20. 998 H. Here it is only stated as one of several opinions on the subject. But the decisive passage occurs in William's Commentary on the Consolation of Boëthius, of which specimens are printed by Jourdain in the Notices et Extraits des Manuscrits, 20 (2). The place in question, p. 53, is sufficiently interesting to be quoted: Anima mundi est naturalis vigor quo habent quedam res tantum moveri, quedam crescere, quedam sentire, quedam discernere. Sed qui sit ille vigor queritur. Sed, ut mihi videtur, ille vigor naturalis est spiritus sanctus, id est, divina et benigna concordia quæ est id a quo omnia habent esse, moveri, crescere, sentire, vivere, discernere. Qui bene dicitur naturalis vigor, quia divino amore omnia crescunt et vigent. Qui bene dicitur anima mundi, quia solo divino amore et caritate omnia quæ in mundo sunt vivunt et habent vivere... Quedam vegetat et facit sentire, ut bruta animalia, quedam facit discernere, ut homines, una et eadem manens anima; sed non in omnibus exercet eandem potentiam, et hoc tarditate et natura corporum faciente, unde Virgilius:

Quantum non noxia corpora tardant.

CHAP. VI. part of professed theologians, there was a general tendency among scholars to take the motive of their theology from philosophy. Christianity was put into a Neo-Platonic setting; and if the result was in many ways fantastic, it was not the less a distinct gain, in an age when everything tended towards a coarse materialism, to have a philosophy which should bring into relief those spiritual and ideal elements of Christianity which have in all times been in danger of suppression under the weight of an organised dogmatic system. It was that characteristic of the Creator so emphatically seized in the Timaeus, namely his essential goodness, which was adopted as paramount by the Platonists of the twelfth century, as it had been by John the Scot in the ninth¹⁰. The thought passed into current theology and could not fail of influence as a counterweight to those dark theories of the divine government which lingered on, partly believed, never entirely disowned, from the predestinarianism of Augustin. Augustin has indeed expressed this principle of goodness in the universe, often with persuasive force, sometimes in passages of exquisite beauty¹¹; but at the same time it is evident that this is too often obscured

¹⁰ It was in this way that Abailard could consider the unpardonable sin, the sin against the holy Ghost, as consisting in a denial of God's Goodness: Heloissae Problem. xiii. Opp. i. 256 sq. No doubt the same sense of God's absolute goodness led him to reject the doctrine of redemption as elaborated by saint Anselm, and to maintain that the work of Christ consisted in attaching mankind to God by the bond of love. See especially the Sententiae (Epitome theologiae Christianae), cap. xxiii. Opp. 2. 569 sqq. Rémusat's treatment of the whole subject, vol. 2. 402-451, is full of interest. Compare Deutsch 367-387: 'Was bei Abälard wirklich fehlt, ist der begriff der stellvertretenden genugthuung in dem sinne dass die vergebung der sünden dadurch bedingt war, dass die strafe derselben von Christo anstatt der menschen getragen wurde,' p. 383.

¹¹ Nec auctor est excellentior deo, nec ars efficacior dei verbo, nec caussa melior, quam ut bonum crearetur a deo bono: De civit. dei xi. 21 Opp. 7. 288 A. Cf. Confess. vii. 11 § 17 vol. i. 140 C.

by his other doctrine which laid so heavy a stress upon the reign of sin, and it cannot be doubtful with which of the two tendencies his influence is historically associated. CHAP. VI.

Probably had not Abailard held so unique a position as a teacher, had he not exulted in publicity, his Platonic theology, which was singular only in its joyful recognition of a world of divine teaching of old outside the borders of Judaism, would never have excited suspicion: more intrepid views than his were promulgated without risk by a multitude of less conspicuous masters; Platonism was in fact the vogue of the day. But, the opposition once aroused, the church had to face a larger problem; she had to decide whether she would hold fast to the old moorings, or whether she could trust herself to sail at freedom, conscious of her intrinsic strength and fearless of any harm from without. The struggle between religion and science, or if we will, between authority and reason, broke out anew; and it seemed as though it were the object of the established powers to drive all professors of secular learning into the fellowship of those obscure and obstinate heretics who had now for a century or more been spreading discord among the churches of Christendom. In truth the principles of the latter stood nearer to those of the guardians of catholic Christianity, than did the philosophy of the schools: they had a tradition, although it was not catholic, in which it was an obligation to place implicit, unreasoning faith. Yet it may be fairly argued that the church would have best consulted her own interests, had she conceded the scant latitude asked by the philosophers and allowed their invigorating force to turn the history of her progress from decay into a new life.

The men whose opinions she proscribed were just CHAP. VI. those whose activity was consistently devoted to the correction of the moral disorders from which she suffered. Roscelin, Abailard, William of Conches are unsparing in their exposure of abuses in the state of the clergy which it was equally the desire of every earnest member of the order to eradicate¹². If Abailard's life be thought to be vitiated by a single fault, his colleagues are invariably blameless. The learned clergy are the exemplars of the age; the unlettered are its reproof. It was owing to the latter, to their degradation in life because in mind, that the church stood in need of repeated, periodical revivals of religious discipline. The stimulus of learning was the least intermittent and therefore the most trustworthy motive for moral advancement: but instead of fostering the seed of promise, the husbandmen of the church rooted it up. Yet, be it observed, the good service and high rectitude of the philosophers were obvious and admitted: the errors were only suspected or guessed at. A complete examination was seldom attempted, never successfully carried out. Whereas the custom of the church, as Abailard notes, had ruled that in such cases argument not force should be the constraining engine, the proceedings of their trials invariably left it open to the accused to declare that his opinions had been misconstrued, that the quotations from his writings had been garbled. No council sat in judgement upon them that received, even among the most loyal catholics, unanimous assent: their sentence was the subject of apology not of congratulation.

⁷ Yet see below p. 195 n. 25.

⁸ Intr. ad theol. ii. p. 76.

¹² Instances may readily be found in the Scito te ipsum of Abailard and in William's Dragmaticon: but the public action of the former is sufficiently declared. On Roscelin see Cousin, Fragments philosophiques 2. 96 sq.

It is in the youth of an intellectual movement that antagonisms such as those to which we refer are sure to arise. The conservative instincts of a corporation, especially of a religious corporation, and most of all when that corporation has the splendid and sacred traditions of the catholic church, are immediately excited at the first whisper of possible competition; and not only so, or at least not so outwardly: it resents the bare idea that its position can be seriously threatened, and it opposes the new tendency because it is new. The text which we hear repeated incessantly through these disputes is that in which the ^aapostle warns Timothy ^{* 1 Tim. vi. 20.} against profanas vocum novitates. The novelty is the profanity. In no example is this consideration plainer than in that of William of Conches, whose ready yielding to the pressure of orthodox objections has been ^bcommented ^{b Supra, pp. 129 sq.} upon in a previous chapter. He withdraws, he condemns as blasphemous, opinions which he admits are capable of defence, solely because their terms are not to be found in the Bible. It is evidently a mere measure of prudence. He does not profess to abate a jot of his belief in the impugned statements: he suppresses the written record of them, and all parties are satisfied.

Side by side with this hardly masked fear of novelty operated another instinct resting, like the first, upon a slavish acceptance of the words of Scripture. The line of demarcation which Christians have ever been disposed to draw between the word of God and the word of man, a separation which can only be soberly held to consist in the absolute or the relative authority with which they speak, was insensibly confused with an altogether different division, that namely between the church and the world, which in essence is determined (in however varying CHAP. VI. forms) by the presence or absence of a moral purpose in life. 'Sacred' and 'secular' in this disastrous mode of thought were treated as the practical equivalents of 'good' and 'bad.' By the time with which we are concerned the phrases had indeed lost something of their significance. They consorted easily with the secure indolence of monasticism, and when people like saint Bernard ventured into the intellectual arena, they were almost the only weapons at their disposal: but when educated men (the distinction is ° Gilbert de la Porrée's) took up the gauntlet, it was usually now as the champions of the old against the new.

* v. infra, p.
193.

It is needless to point out the disadvantages to the attacked party of such terms of combat. Prepossessed with a blind reliance on their elders as by far the majority of medieval churchmen were (and it was the church which in all cases claimed the power of deciding questions which more strictly belong to the cognisance of philosophy), the result was practically certain before the argument began. At the same time, as we have said, it by no means followed that the verdict of a council commanded general acceptance: private sentiments of prejudice or favour,—a reluctance to assume nice points as irrevocably fixed, concerning which even the fathers were supposed to have allowed some latitude, and which few persons even pretended to understand,—all these motives, apart from the existence of personal attachment to the opinions condemned, coöperated to make such proceedings matters for criticism, a source of uneasiness to the faithful and a rock of offence to the hardier intellects among them. The trial of Gilbert de la Porrée furnishes a striking illustration of this, and it is the more deserving of close study since in it we have the rare advantage of three contemporary witnesses, of whom two speak to what they actually saw and all discourse at length of the general bearings of the transaction. CHAP. VI.

Gilbert de la Porrée, bishop of Poitiers, has ^d already come before our notice as the most distinguished disciple of Bernard of Chartres; a man, it was considered, of universal learning, ^e who in the true spirit of his school gathered together every detail of accessible knowledge to illustrate and perfect his work. But unlike Bernard his principal interest lay in applying his acquirements to the investigation of theological problems; with him religion was the first thing. His theological activity is represented by a weighty and extensive Commentary on the Books on the Trinity, really a collection of treatises of different and uncertain age, but currently attributed to Boëthius ¹³, and endued with the unbounded authority

^d Supra, pp. 132 sqq.

^e v. supra, p. 121.

¹³ Abailard seems to have had his doubts about their authenticity; see his words, 'Boëthius in eo quem de Trinitate composuisse libro dicitur, ait,' &c.: Theol. Christ. iii. p. 471 (compare however Dr Deutsch's criticism, p. 75 n. 3). Their spuriousness has been finally proved by the exhaustive dissertation of Dr Friedrich Nitzsch, now professor at Kiel, Das System des Boëthius und die ihm zugeschriebenen theologischen Schriften; Berlin 1860. Dr Nitzsch observes, p. 27, that neither Isidore of Seville, who was well acquainted with Boëthius' writings nor any other author down to the end of the eighth century, is aware of the existence of any theological works by him. Of the four books On the Trinity, as they appear in the Basle edition, 1570 folio (for number and order vary), book i is first referred to by Alcuin, some two hundred and fifty years after Boëthius' death; books ii and iv first by Hincmar of Rheims nearly a century later (p. 24 n. 2). It is not even certain that any of them have a common author, though books i and ii may have (p. 127): these two are in any case the composition of a far later date than Boëthius'. Book iv on the contrary, which is expressly directed 'adversus Eutychen et Nestorium,' Dr Nitzsch argues with great plausibility, pp. 130 sqq. (cf. pp. 154 sqq.), is a product of the time of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and belongs to the actual monophysite controversy some twenty years or more before Boëthius' birth. Finally the third book has obtained its place by accident or mistake, since it bears no relation at all to Christian theology: like its predecessors it belongs, as Dr Nitzsch judges, p. 24 n. 1, to a time long posterior to Boëthius'. Dr von Prantl, Geschichte der Logik, 2. 108 n. 35, apparently before Dr Nitzsch's book reached him, claimed the whole set for a production 'not earlier than the ninth century;' but Alcuin's quotation is decisive in

CHAP. VI. that belonged to one who was ranked with Cicero

^f Abael. intr.
ad theol. ii.
p. 87; cf. lib.
iii. p. 116.

among the chief of Latin philosophers. Gilbert's general mode of approaching his subject suggests to a great extent, consciously or unconsciously, that of John the Scot¹⁴. He seeks to unite theology and philosophy, and he arrives at a similar result. Although he has not the affirmative and negative antithesis which forms so characteristic an element in the Scot's system, he is not the less precise in excluding the nature of God from the domain of human enquiry. ^g God is to him, on the one hand, the supreme abstraction, of which we can predicate nothing; on the other, he is the fulness of all being, which sums up and unites that which in the universe exists only in division and variety. The dominant idea, however, in Gilbert's mind is plainly the former¹⁵. He undertook to prove, just as ^h Abailard had done, that the highest truths of theology stand apart from and above the comprehension of our understanding, can only be hinted at by analogies and figures of speech. Yet in fact he started from a precisely opposite principle to Abailard's, since he held that in theology faith precedes theol. i. pp.

^g Lipsius, ubi
infra, p. 212.

^h Intr. ad
88 sq.

respect to book i and therefore, I incline to think, in respect to book ii, while the arguments in favour of an early date for book iv seem overpowering.

¹⁴ He has even the Scot's four-fold division of nature: 'Perfecta vero esset [Boëthii] divisio si ita dixisset, vel quod facere et non pati, vel quod pati et non facere, vel quod pati et facere, vel quod nec facere nec pati potest:' in Boëth. iv. p. 1227, ed. 1570.

¹⁵ The whole subject of Gilbert's views is of head-breaking intricacy. Those who wish to examine it in detail will find some light in Ritter 3. 442-448, and still more in an article by Dr Lipsius entirely devoted to Gilbert's theology, under his title, in Ersch and Gruber's Allgemeine Encyclopädie, sect. 1 vol. 67; 1858. Bishop Hefele's summary, Conciliengeschichte, 5. 446 sqq., cf. pp. 460 sq., is interesting; but I think he gives too much credit to the accounts of Gilbert's opponents, and suspect that he would have been less adverse to the accused bishop in all respects, had the history of John of Salisbury been published at the time he wrote. Previously it was of course permissible to prefer the narrative of an eyewitness, Geoffrey of Auxerre, to that of Otto of Freising who knew what he records only by report. See below, pp. 185 sq.

reason, reason is impotent of itself to teach it us. CHAP. VI.
 Nevertheless Gilbert's exposition of his views is contained in one of the subtlest and most elaborate contributions to theological metaphysics that the middle ages have as yet given forth; and his opinions and Abailard's produced a similar effect upon their less inquisitive, though perhaps not less orthodox, contemporaries. They appeared to render unmeaning that phraseology concerning divine things which had taken so deep a root in the pious consciousness of Christendom: this, it would be inferred, could be possessed of but a partial and temporary truth, which to ordinary minds might seem not far removed from falsehood.

Gilbert's real difficulty, however, concerned the Trinity. The being of God, he held, is absolute: we can predicate nothing of it; ¹ not even substance, as we ordinarily understand the term, for substance is what it is by virtue of its properties and accidents, and God has no properties and accidents: he is simple being. It is incorrect therefore to say that his substance, divinity, is God; ² we can only speak of the substance by virtue of which he is God. It is evident that this thesis of an absolute Unity logically carried out, is of such a nature as to exclude the existence within it of a Trinity. ³ The three persons must be something external and non-essential: in the substance by which they are God, in nature, they are one ⁴; but as regards the substance or form which they are, they are three in number, three in genus, three distinct and individual beings; the three persons, as such, could not be said to be one God. Gilbert thus

¹ Comm. in Boëth. i. p. 1154.

² Cf. Lipsius pp. 214 sq., 221.

³ Comm. i. pp. 1150 sqq., 1155 sq., 1167; cf. lib. ii. p. 1173.

⁴ Quod dicitur illorum, . . . quilibet esse deus, refertur ad substantiam non quae est sed qua est, id est, non ad subsistentem sed ad subsistentiam: Comm. in Boëth. i. p. 1161.

CHAP. VI. hardly escaped the paradox of tritheism: and yet it is impossible to doubt that the heresy was one of expression, not of fact. The contradictions that make his study so confusing are due to the presence in the writer's mind of an idea of a supreme Unity surpassing human thought or speech, a Unity which forbade the coëxistence of multiplicity. He could only apply the analogy of his own realistic philosophy and infer, or lead his readers to infer, that as humanity was a single essence by participation in which individual men were said to exist, so did the three Persons subsist, as individuals, by participation in the one absolute God.

On whichever side of Gilbert's theology we dwell, however innocent the one, however obscure the other, we cannot wonder that it startled many of his more timid or pious hearers, accustomed as they were to the definition and classification of the divine attributes authorised in the formularies of the church. ^m The bishop appears ⁿ Hist. pontif. xii. p. 526.

^m Gaufr. Cl. raevell. epist. ad Henr., ii. Bern. opp. 2. 1319 D. A.D. 1146.

^o Otto de gest. Frid. i. 46, Pertz 20. 376; Gaufr. ep., l. c.

^p Otto, l. c.

to have been drawn into a discussion with Arnald, one of his archdeacons, and then into a formal exposition of his views before the assembled clergy of his diocese. It is admitted by ⁿ John of Salisbury,—and the former part of the statement will not be denied by anyone who has read the commentary on Boëthius,—that Gilbert was obscure to beginners but all the more compendious and solid to advanced scholars. To the synod the doctrine was new, and therefore dangerous; and ^o the alarmed archdeacons hastened to report their fears, the bishop to defend his orthodoxy, to the pope Eugenius the Third. The latter was at Siena, about to visit France, and gave them a promise that he would submit the points in dispute to an ample examination on his arrival in that country ^p because by reason of the learned men there resident,

he would be the better enabled to make the enquiry than in CHAP. VI.
 Italy. In the meanwhile the complainants secured a more formidable champion in the person of Bernard of Clairvaux, to whom heretic-hunting was a monomania. An unprejudiced contemporary, himself certainly no heretic, has passed a remarkable judgement upon the saint in connexion with his action in this affair. The aforesaid abbat, says the biographer of Frederick Barbarossa, bishop ^a Otto of Freising, was from the fervour of his Christian religion as jealous as, from his habitual meekness, he was in some measure credulous; so that he held in abhorrence those who trusted in the wisdom of this world and were too much attached to human reasonings, and if anything alien from the Christian faith were said to him in reference to them, he readily gave ear to it. In other words Bernard's constitutional distrust of the unaided human intellect conspired with a jealousy of those who had the power of turning it to account, to incline him to believe any talk discreditable to their Christian reputation.

^a Ibid., cap. 47 p. 376.

Perhaps the verdict of history has hardly acquiesced in so injurious a view of his conduct: perhaps it was the very single-mindedness of his trust in spiritual things that made him recoil from any attempt to introduce into that sphere the reasons and questions of the world. They were tainted by their source, and to bring them into alliance with the spiritual was to pollute the faith and, as it were, to seek to unite Christ and Belial. But had Bernard's aim been realised, there could have been no more room for the rational development of the human mind, unless, were it possible, as an independent existence having no contact with its spiritual functions. Happily there was no excuse for the forcing into being of a premature secularism, a tendency as destructive of CHAP. VI. the intellectual powers as Bernard's spiritual absolutism. For he had no metaphysical theory of the unknowableness of the highest truths: on the contrary, they were the most certain, the only certain, knowledge. He had no wish to draw distinctions between the province of the spiritual and the intellectual, and leave the latter free within its own domain: he simply demanded its suppression; and against this blind claim on behalf of authority the better feeling of the age rebelled.

^r Capp. 47-50
pp. 376-379.

^r Bishop Otto illustrates Bernard's nervous susceptibility to the danger of human speculation by the instance of his treatment of Abailard: thus he explains the motive that prompted the trial of Gilbert de la Porrée. He sets the two cases in skilful and artistic juxtaposition. Yet he has certainly little sympathy with the philosopher whose personality has retained so unique an attraction for the modern world. To him Abailard appears, as he appears to a cynical ^scritic of our own day, as little more than a rhetorician. He distrusts his method and his self-confident temper: he cannot forgive him for his scorn of his teachers, and is persuaded that he engaged in dialectical disputes for the mere pastime of the thing. Yet even here Otto's judgement goes against his private aversion, and he is constrained to quote the story of Abailard's trial and condemnation as a proof of saint Bernard's credulity and morbid dislike of learned men. In fact the attitude of jealousy, of suspicion, produced in men's minds by Abailard's independent and arrogant bearing, was the chief justification of the usage to which he was subjected. But these circumstances were wanting in the affair of Gilbert de la Porrée: ^t the case, says Otto, was not the same, nor the matter kindred. For Gilbert had from youth submitted himself to the teaching of great men, and

^s Prantl 2.
168 sq.

^t Cap. 50 p.
379.

trusted in their weight rather than in his own powers. He was on all accounts a serious and humble enquirer, and a man whose personal character stood as high as his reputation for learning. So undisputed indeed was his integrity that to attack him on points of faith might seem a hopeless undertaking. His archdeacons therefore were fain to resort to Clairvaux and rely on the authority and weight of abbat Bernard to accomplish Gilbert's overthrow as successfully as the same agency had been formerly employed against Abailard.

The calm narrative of the subsequent proceedings which Otto attempts has not been "universally accepted as history. It has been held to be invalidated not only by the fact that the writer was ²at the time absent on the luckless enterprise of the second crusade, but also by a circumstance mentioned by his continuator Ragewin, namely that the bishop was haunted on his deathbed by a fear *lest he should have said anything in favour of the opinion of master Gilbert that might offend any one*¹⁷: and Otto's story certainly gives a very different presentment of the facts from that which we owe to the loyal industry of Bernard's secretary, Geoffrey of Auxerre, in after years himself abbat of Clairvaux.) Geoffrey's account is contained in a set polemic against what he considered Gilbert's errors, and also in a letter which he addressed ³forty years later to Henry¹⁸, cardinal bishop of Albano, lis, ecclesiae regulam professus est: De gest. Frid. iv. 11 p. 452. It does not however appear whether these corrections were actually carried out. Can our present text be that of a modified recension? The 'ut patet in prioribus' rather implies, not.

CHAP. VI.

² v. Mabillon, annales o. s. B. 6. 434, Morison, s. Bern. 463 n. 1. ³ De gest. Frid. i. 58 p. 385; cf. cap. 44 p. 375.

¹⁷ Inter caetera quae sollicitus de salute sua praevidebat, etiam hunc codicem manibus suis offerri praecepit, eumque litteratis et religiosis viris tradidit, ut si quid pro sententia magistri Gileberti, ut patet in prioribus, dixisse visus esset quod quempiam posset offendere, ad ipsorum arbitrium corrigeretur, seque catholicae fidei assertorem iuxta sanctae Romanae, imo et universa-

¹⁸ The arguments in the Histoire littéraire de la France 14. 339 n., seem decisive as to the name, which is given in the edition as Albinus.

³ Epist., cap. xiii, ubi supra, col. 1324 C, D.

CHAP. VI. and whose date by itself deprives it of a good deal of its value. The writer in both documents may be said to hold the brief for the prosecution: he does himself harm by the heat and passion of his language, and his candour has been a frequent subject of controversy as much among the allies of saint Bernard in modern times as among his detractors. At length the publication of John of Salisbury's narrative in his Historia Pontificalis,—the work, be it remembered, of a man of indisputable orthodoxy, a friend of both parties in the suit, and an eye-witness of its final stage,—has conclusively established the general correctness of Otto's report and goes far to justify the criticism, made by *an older scholar long before this confirmation could be appealed to, that Geoffrey tells so many falsehoods in so short a compass, that he must be judged entirely undeserving of credence.

* Oudin de scriptor. eccl. 2. 1284.

* Otto, cap. 50 p. 379.

* A council was summoned to examine Gilbert's heresy at Auxerre; it met at Paris in 1147. In his previous audience with the pope, the accused prelate had confidently denied the charges laid against him, and contradicted, or perplexed by fine-drawn interpretations (this is the account of an enemy), the utterances to which he had publicly committed himself at Poitiers¹⁹. ^b At Paris however denial was not sufficient. ^c Adam du Petit Pont, a practised logician who was specially noted ^d for the petty jealousy of his temper, and Hugh of Champfleury, ^e afterwards chancellor to the king of France and bishop of Soissons, came forward to declare the accuracy of the indictment against Gilbert. ^f The latter on his side called witnesses, once his scholars, now his fellow-bishops. He was

^b Gaufr. libell., col. 1325 C.

^c Otto, c. 51 p. 379.

^d v. infra, pp. 208 sq.

^e Gall. Chr. 8. 361; hist. litt. 13. 537.

^f Gaufr. l. c.; epist. ii., col. 1319 E-1320 A.

¹⁹ Elegit autem negare omnia, etiam quae Pictavis in synodo sua manifeste arguebatur fuisse confesus. Inter negandum tamen an-fractuosius quibusdam, more suo, verborum cavillationibus utebatur: Gaufr. Libell. contra capitula Gilberti, Bern. Opp. 2. 1325 A, B.

confident in his orthodoxy, and overpowered the council by the subtilty of his distinctions. The judges demanded evidence which he could not traverse, his own book on Boëthius; but it was not to be found. Gilbert had it not with him, and his disciples thought it safer not to surrender it to the uncertain scrutiny of the council. Some extracts were however obtained, and Gilbert was confronted with them; but to no purpose. ^g The pope declared himself baffled. Gilbert's explanations were so unsatisfactory, so violent, Geoffrey says, that it was deemed advisable to adjourn the council to a fresh meeting to be held at Rheims in the following year. Meanwhile Gottschalk, abbat of Saint Éloy, was entrusted with the extracts, which he was to furnish with annotations for future use; and Gilbert was enjoined to attend on the occasion named with his Commentary for examination.

CHAP. VI.

^g Otto i. 54 p. 381.

At Rheims Bernard's friends assembled in greater force. ^h Robert of Melun, Peter the Lombard, and other leaders of the schools of the day²⁰ were there as advocates for the prosecution. But opinion was as much divided in respect of their motives as of the subject-matter of the charge. John of Salisbury, who was present through the whole proceedings, leaves it an open question whether the offence lay in a substantial disagreement with 'the rules' or in the mere appearance of such a disagreement, arising from the unusual form of the words Gilbert employed²¹: for, he remarks, it is

A. D. 1148.

^h Hist pont. viii. p. 522.

²⁰ John's list, some of the other names in which I have added below, p. 189, is supplemented by the enumeration taken from a manuscript of Ottoboni in Mabillon, Annales O. S. B. 6. 435. This includes names like Walter of Mortagne, Theodoric of Chartres, and again

Adam du Petit Pont.

²¹ Cf. Otto i. 46 p. 376: 'Consuetus ex ingenii subtilis magnitudine ac rationum acumine multa praeter communem hominum morem dicere.' Compare too ch. 52 p. 379.

CHAP. VI. certain that a good many things are now handled by scholars in public which when he put them forward were reckoned as profane novelties. John's criticism of the character of the prosecution betrays well enough the general estimate of it among cultivated men outside the immediate circle of partisans. He doubts whether Gilbert's accusers were moved by the zeal of faith, or by emulation of a more illustrious and deserving name, or by a desire to get favour with the abbat, whose authority was then supreme. As to abbat Bernard himself, he adds, there are several opinions, some thinking one way and some another, in reference to his having acted with such vigour against men of so great renown in letters as Peter Abailard and the aforesaid Gilbert, as to procure the condemnation of the one, to wit, Peter, and to use all his power to condemn the other. How could a man of so singular a holiness have broken out into such intemperance as his conduct would seem to imply? We cannot think of jealousy as the moving principle here; Bernard must have been actuated by a righteous zeal. But as to the object of his assault, John could as little be persuaded that Gilbert had really committed himself to views from which Bernard was bound to dissent: for—the reason is curious and characteristic—Gilbert was a man of the clearest intellect, and of the widest reading; he had spent some sixty years in study and the exercise of literature, and was so ripe in liberal culture as to be surpassed by no one, rather it was believed that in all things he excelled all men.

There was thus a presumption in Gilbert's favour possibly not less powerful than the evidence against him.

[†] Libell., col. 325 D, E. Even ¹Geoffrey has to confess that though few were for the doctrine, very many were for the man, and did all they could to excuse and extenuate even opinions which they did not hold.

Bernard's party accordingly judged it prudent to organise their attack and to prepare for possible contingencies by a rehearsal, as it were, of the trial. ^kAt this secret meeting were present the archbishop Theobald of Canterbury, Geoffrey of Bourdeaux, and Henry of York, the influential abbat Suger of Saint Denys, and two future English primates, Thomas Becket and Robert of York. The fact transpired when the council met, and with it another fact not less unfavourable to the confederates, namely that the issue had broadened from a case as between Gilbert and the catholic church, to one ^las between the pope and the cardinals on the one side and the prelates of France and England on the other. There was a risk of a schism. In effect it was not Gilbert, but the influence of Bernard himself, that was at trial; and ^mit was openly rumoured that the council was arranged ⁿwith the object of forcing the apostolic see to follow Bernard under a threat of withdrawing from the Roman communion ²².

^aAll the cardinals but one united in resisting him: these, they said, were the arts by which he had assaulted Abailard, and they would have nothing to do with them. Bernard sought to win over the pope, for he was a man, says John, mighty in work and speech before God, as it is believed, and as is well-known, before men: but although usually successful, he was impeded in the present instance by the opposing unanimity of the cardinals.

^oGilbert therefore approached the struggle with confidence. ^pHe brought not only the book on which he claimed to be judged, but his clerks followed with great tomes, presumably of the fathers, noted to support his arguments. He had evidently an advantage over his

CHAP. VI.

^k Hist. pontif. viii. pp. 522 sq.^l Otto i. 57 p. 384.^m Hist. pont. ix. pp. 523 sq.^a Cf. Otto, capp. 56, 57 pp. 382, 383.^o Hist. pont. x. p. 524.
^p Gaufr. epist. iv. col. 1320 D, E; Otto i. 56 p. 382.

²² See John of Salisbury's words, 'Dicebant ad hoc esse convocatos, ut apostolica sedes metu schismatis cogeretur abbatem sequi:' cap. ix.

CHAP. VI.

- enemies who had only a sheet of manipulated extracts to go upon; and ^qGeoffrey was reduced to fetching as many books as he could from the church-library in order to persuade the council that his authorities were a match for the bishop's. The trick, he thought, was an effective one; but ^rJohn of Salisbury assures us that the feeling of the council was all on Gilbert's side, and that the impression made by the wide reading he showed was carried home by the eloquence of his language; for ^she had a grave dignity both in voice and gesture. Every circumstance lent force to the earnestness with which he repudiated opinions which had been wrung and wrested out of his book. ^t*He declared that he was not to be called upon to agree with other men's works but with his own. . . He was not an heretic nor would be, but was and had ever been ready to acquiesce in the truth and to follow apostolical doctrine: for it is not ignorance of the truth that makes the heretic, but a puffing up of the mind that breeds contumacy and breaks out into the presumption of strife and schism.* The fourfold indictment which had been drawn up he entirely disclaimed: a supplemental count which ^ucharged him with limiting the applicability of baptism, roused him to indignation; that document, he exclaimed, I anathematise with him who wrote it, and all the heresies therein recited.
- ^xGilbert's protest appeared to saint Bernard and his friends in the light of a mean piece of shuffling; but ^ythe cardinals were satisfied that he had made out his innocence, and demanded the destruction of the bill setting forth the minor charges. The pope gave the order, which was at once ^zcarried out by the subdeacon of the curia. Then followed a lively scene of disorder among the crowd of laity present, who were unable to follow the proceedings of the council and supposed that

^q Epist. v, vi. col. 1321 B, D.

^r Hist. pont. x. p. 524.

^s Otto i. 50 p. 379.

^t Hist. pont., l. c.

^u Cf. Otto i. 50 p. 379.

^x Gaufr. epist. v. col. 1321 C.

^y Hist. pont., l. c.

^z Cf. Gaufr. epist. ix. col. 1322 D, E.

Gilbert was already condemned; and the pope had to explain to them in French that it was not done to the injury of Gilbert, for that it was not his book, whereas he was found catholic in all respects and agreeable to the apostolical doctrine. ^{CHAP. VI.} The four principal accusations ^{ Hist. pont. xi. pp. 524 sq.} however still remained, and Gilbert's energetic repudiation of them could not exclude the possibility that the corpus delicti, his Commentary on Boëthius, itself, really contained doctrines as objectionable as they; and it was not intended to give him the benefit of a flaw in the indictment. His opponents accordingly addressed their skill to the Commentary; but here they were still more obviously outmatched for, however creditably they might argue on detached points for which patristic proofs and disproofs had been previously prepared for them, no one present was sufficiently qualified by his learning to criticise the whole book in detail²³. The pope proposed that it should be handed to him that he might erase anything that might require erasure; but Gilbert repeated that his orthodoxy was assured and that it was ^{• Gaufr. epist. viii. col. 1322 D.} his own duty to alter whatever was amiss in the book, a declaration received with loud applause by the cardinals, who thought that now at last their work was nearly over.

But Bernard had one more shaft in his quiver. He, or his satellite Geoffrey of Auxerre, had constructed a

²³ Helinand, Chron. xlviii., a. 1148, relates a conversation he had with an adherent of Gilbert, master Stephen of Alinerra (Aliverra, or Alvierra, Alberic. Chron., a. 1149 Bouquet 13. 702 B; cf. Pertz 23. 840, 1874), one of the clerks of Henry count of Champagne, and canon of Beauvais, who boasted that at the council of Rheims 'our Bernard could prevail nothing against his Gilbert,' and detracted in other ways from Bernard's reputation in the affair. Wherefore, conjectures the chronicler, master Stephen died in the very year of this interview: Tissier, Scriptt. Cisterc. Opp. hist. (appended to the eighth volume of the Bibliotheca Cisterc.) p. 186 b; 1669.

CHAP. VI.

set of ^dfour formulas corresponding to and correcting the four heresies enumerated in the original indictment. This symbol was to be a test of Gilbert's obedience. But the fact that Gilbert had throughout unswervingly declared his adhesion to the catholic faith combined with the 'cardinals' long smouldering jealousy of Bernard's influence to make its production the signal for an angry outcry. ^fThe document was at length admitted, as it were, on sufferance, but not so as to bind the council to its terms : nor can we tell with certainty how far Gilbert accepted it. ^gJohn of Salisbury says, he was admonished that if there was anything in his book repugnant to the formulas, he should emend it in conformity with them, and that submitting to this injunction he was acquitted. ^hOtto of Freising on the other hand relates that owing to the confusion it was impossible to arrive at any decision on the last three points, it being doubtful whether there was any actual divergence of opinion among the parties. The pope however gave his ruling on the first head : he directed that no reasoning in theology should make a division between nature and person, and that the essence of God should not be predicated in the sense of the ablative case only, but also of the nominative. The humour which ⁱmodern writers have discerned in the closing phrase, an anticlimax seldom wanting in the events of ecclesiastical councils, did not disturb the gravity of the proceedings. The bishop reverently received the sentence ; he took back his archdeacons into favour, and returned with his order untouched and honour unabated to his own diocese.

^d Otto i. 56 p. 383; Hist. pont. xi. p. 525; Bern. opp. 2. 1339 A-C; Gaufr. ep. vii. col. 1322 F, 1322 A.

^e Otto i. 57 pp. 383 sq.

^f Hist. pont. xi. p. 525.

^g Ibid.

^h Capp. 56, 57 pp. 383 sq.

ⁱ Oudin 2. 1283 sq.; hist. litt. de la France 12. 489.

^k Serm. in cantic. lxxx. § 9, opp. 1. 1549 B.

^l Libell., col. 1325 B; epist.

It is right to add that Bernard and his followers did not own themselves beaten. ^kThe former says that Gilbert expressly recanted, and ^lGeoffrey solemnly relates how, when judgement was given, the culprit in fear and trembling, in the hearing of all, renounced with his own mouth those things which he had professed, refuted them severally, and promised for the future neither to write or say or even think anything of the sort again. But a curious fact is, that instead of Gilbert's book having been suppressed, it was the formal indictment against him that suffered this fate. The minor charges had been destroyed in public session of the council, and it was doubtless deemed discreet to make away with the rest. At least ^{CHAP. VI.} ^{ad Henr. i.,} ^{viii. col. 1319} ^{B, 1322 C, D;} ^{vit. Bern. v.} ^{15 col. 1123 B.} ^{= Hist. pont.} ^{xi. xii. pp.} ^{525 sq.} *John of Salisbury states positively that although he remembered hearing the indictment read, he could never find it either in the papal register or in the Acts of the council, and only lit upon it at last in that work of Geoffrey's, which he temperately describes as written in an elegant style but vitiated by the singular bitterness of its tone. He proceeds to comment, with the same surprise as he expressed at the beginning of his narrative, upon the manner in which Bernard continued to attack Gilbert even after the latter's absolution by the council. Yet Bernard once made overtures to him,—and John, the friend of both, was the intermediary,—to hold a friendly discussion on certain questions raised by the writings of saint Hilary. The bishop declined with grave asperity: *it was sufficient that they had contended thus far, and if the abbat desired a full understanding of Hilary, he must first get better instructed in liberal learning and other matters pertaining to the discussion: for, explains Salisbury, Bernard, however great as a preacher, knew little of secular letters, wherein, as it is believed, the bishop was surpassed by no one of our time.

Still the council had really decided nothing. Whether Bernard, says ^{= Lib. i. 57} ^{p. 384.} Otto, was deceived by human infirmity or Gilbert outwitted the council, it is not our place to

CHAP. VI. enquire or judge. The talk was, says °John of Salis-

• Cap. xii. p. 526.

bury, that the bishop was more adroit than candid. But John is loyal to his old master: because, he says, he could not be understood by his opponents, they maintained that he hid his perfidy in guile and obscure words. Nor did Gilbert profess himself satisfied with the result. ¶ He wrote a new preface to his Commentary, to prove its substantial harmony with the confession of faith which Bernard had put before the council. It was impossible, he declared, to write anything that should not be open to misunderstanding. Is the Bible heretical because Arius and Sabellius read their heresies in it²⁴? Was Gilbert to supply his readers with brains? There is no doubt that the apologist touches the spring of the whole antagonism. It was not really a controversy between faith and error, but between ignorance and learning; and in this way do we understand how it was that the character and position of Gilbert, and nearly to the same extent of Abailard, remained unaffected by the obloquy to which they were exposed. The affair in fact interested only a very few outside the circle of Bernard's intimates. To these denunciation was a point of party honour, but to the rest of the world the proceedings or the results of the councils appear either unknown or else so questionable as to be practically put out of account. The latter alternative, however, hardly accords with the slender mental attainments of the monastic chroniclers who may be taken as reflecting the opinions of the average of churchmen: their notices persuade us that they were simply ignorant that the great names ¶ Capp. xiii., xiv. pp. 527-530: cf. infra, append. ix.

²⁴ Se vero dicebat non maiori sapientia vel gratia praeditum quam apostolos et prophetas, qui licet in eis loqueretur spiritus sanctus, ta-men aliis facti sunt odor vite in vitam et aliis odor mortis in mortem: Hist. pontific. xiii. p. 527.

they commemorate had ever encountered, or been overwhelmed by, the storm of religious hatred. CHAP. VI.

A few specimens will justify this statement. Their selection makes no pretence to an elaborate or critical examination, for all we seek is the popular report that won currency with reference to Abailard and Gilbert. It was usual when the news arrived of a famous man's death to enter it in what we may call the day-book of the monastery, and the epithet attached to the name would be that given to it by common rumour. In process of time these jottings would be dressed by a more ambitious member of the fraternity who would add details and specifications derived from other chronicles which circulated in the religious world of his day: so that though the work itself might be a century or more later than some of the events it relates, its evidence would still be carried back, through its secondary sources and through the acceptance which these latter had obtained, to that popular version of the original facts which we wish to discover.

The summary perhaps most often repeated of Abailard's career is that which appears in the ^a Chronologia of Robert, monk of Saint Marianus, Auxerre, who died in 1212, in a ^r Chronicle of Saint Martin at Tours of slightly later date, and in other compilations. It occurs under the date of the council of Sens, assembled, says the record, against Peter Abailard; but instead of even suggesting what the acts of the council were, it at once turns to a panegyric of the man: *he was of intellect most subtil, and a marvellous philosopher*²⁵; who founded a religious

²⁵ In an obituary in the Nantes chronicle he is described as 'mirae abstinenciae monachus, tantaeque subtilitatis philosophus cui nostra parem nec prima [leg. priora?] secundum secula viderunt;' Chron. Britann., a. 1143, Bouquet 12. 558 B. The first words of the sentence are

CHAP. VI. house in the land of Troyes, afterwards famous as the
 * v. supra, p. 145 n. 9. *abbey of the Paraclete. In the same way another chronicle, actually a chronicle of Sens itself, commemorates Abailard's death as that not of a convicted heretic but as of one of the canons of the church of Sens, who established convents of nuns, particularly the abbey of the Paraclete, where he is buried with his wife. The multiplication of Abailard's exploits shows how his local fame had grown with years: but that it was his religious work that survived, and the scandal of his opinions that was forgotten, is a fair proof of the relative notoriety of the two.

Abailard's heresy, however, is not always ignored. An early chronicler, the English monk, William Godell, who wrote about the year 1173, enters into some detail on the subject; and his evidence is the more instructive since he is *particularly well informed about the affairs of the diocese of Sens, in which he is supposed to have lived. [†] There flourished also, he says, in this same time (he has just commemorated saint Bernard) master Peter Abaelard, a man of very subtil intellect, and a great writer and teacher. Howbeit he was made by some the object of blame, and especially by the aforesaid abbat Bernard: for which cause a council was assembled, whereat he was present, and many things which were accused against him he steadily repelled, and very many he convincingly proved not to be his, which his opponents averred were his and said by him; yea, and at length he repudiated all heresy, and confessed and declared that he would be the son of the catholic church, and thereafter in the peace of brotherhood finished his life. He proceeds to relate the foundation of the Paraclete in the same terms as those upon which we have commented in very remarkable when we bear in mind the assertions commonly made as to Abailard's loss of credit in consequence of his relations with Heloïssa.

* v. Bouquet
13. 671 n.

† Ibid., p.
675 B.

Robert of Auxerre²⁶. The testimony, it may doubtless be objected, is that of a partisan, although written a generation after the events to which it refers: but it is at least remarkable that, except among his own biographers, Bernard has to wait a good half-century more before his case is admitted into history-books²⁷. The Cistercian *Helinand, who died in 1227, is apparently the first to do this, in respect both to Abailard and Gilbert de la Porrée; and those who follow him, †Alberic of Trois Fontaines (as he is commonly known), towards the middle of the century, †Vincent of Beauvais²⁸, like Helinand a Cistercian, and others, all expressly rely upon his statement as an authority, whether singly or in combination with the biography of Geoffrey of Clairvaux and the Epistles of Bernard himself: they do not profess to record undisputed facts.

To return, however, to the less conscious annalists, we find †a favourite combination, the very incongruity of which makes no small part of its significance, which ²⁶ I conjecture that this concluding portion in William, p. 675 B, C, is not original, but that he and the others have taken it from a common source. Else I know not how the latter writers, supposing that they drew from Godell, should have passed over the question of Abailard's trial in silence. For the rest, William Godell is, so far as I know, the first writer who gives the beginning of the famous epitaph, cited above, p. 145, n. 9.

²⁷ This does not of course hold true of the proper theological literature. Compare below, appendix x.

²⁸ Vincent has elsewhere, Speculum naturale xxxiii. 94, a notice of the council of Sens in which he merely says that Abailard 'quadam prophana verborum vel sensuum novitate scandalizabat eccle-siam.' The phrase is characteristic, and recurs in some of the continuators of Sigebert, Appendix alterius Roberti, Bouquet 13. 330 E, 331 A, and Contin. Praemonstrat., Pertz 6. 452, who also apply it in modified terms to Gilbert de la Porrée. Gilbert's work, they say, a. 1148, Bouquet 332 D, Pertz 454, 'by reason of some new subtilty of words caused scandal to the church.' Robert however admits that it 'contained many useful things.' Among later writers William of Nangy, a. 1141 and 1148, Bouquet 20. 731 D, 733 D-734 A, is mainly dependent for his views upon Geoffrey, whose description of Abailard, 'celeberri-mus in opinione scientiae sed de fide perfide dogmatizans' (Vit. Bern. v. 13 col. 1122 B) he substantially adopts.

CHAP. VI. grouped together the name of Abailard with that of Hugh of Saint Victor,—the master of sacred learning who held a place in the respect of the middle ages, with saint Anselm and saint Bernard, as an immediate successor of the fathers. The juxtaposition would be inexplicable but on the assumption to which we have been already led, namely that piety was an essential ingredient in the popular idea of Abailard. Even more extraordinary is a notice in the Tours chronicle to which reference has been made above, which ^bassociates in the same sentence, as the representative churchmen of the age, Bernard of Clairvaux and Gilbert de la Porrée²⁹. With reference indeed to Gilbert it is not necessary to collect testimony. On the one hand, he had not the European fame of Abailard; on the other, it is agreed that, whatever the issue of the council of Rheims, he left it acquitted or ^cabsolved, and lived the rest of his days in honour. But there is one circumstance which we can hardly be wrong in connecting with that council of 1148, and which throws a curious light upon the feelings it should seem to have excited. The notice in the ^d*History of the Pontiffs and Counts of Angoulême*, a work which dates from a very few years later, may be quoted without comment. On the 15th of June, 1149, the clergy of the city chose for their bishop a certain Hugh de la Rochefoucauld, a man well-trained in the liberal arts, who had attended master Gilbert in Gaul and most of all followed him in theology. That, clearly, was his title to election.

If the religious character of Abailard and Gilbert remained untouched by the suspicion of heresy, as little

^b Chr. s. Mart. Turon., ibid. p. 472 B.

^c Alberic. chr.,
a. 1149, Bou-quet 13. 702 B.

^d Bouquet 12.
399 D, E.

²⁹ Actually in William of Nangy the names thus occur, with that of the Irish saint Malachias inserted between them: Chron., a. 1138, Bouquet 20. 730 E.

did their influence as teachers suffer on that account. CHAP. VI.

^aIn the letters calling upon the pope to ratify the sentence of the council of Sens, the argument which Bernard pressed as of prime urgency was that Abailard's teaching was being diffused over the whole world by a large and enthusiastic body of disciples: and if he had no one legitimate successor, at least his opinions were thought worthy of a detailed refutation nearly forty years after his death by Walter of Saint Victor, a man who presented in his day, though with less authority, the same attitude of defiant hostility to all secular learning as saint Bernard had done before him. Forty years too after the trial of Gilbert de la Porrée the number of his disciples was so considerable as to draw the vehement ^fGeoffrey, now abbat of Clairvaux, once more into the fray, to denounce and to vituperate. The decision of the council of Rheims, he still found, was ^gpowerless to restrain the ardour of his disciples: in spite of it, ^hBernard himself had complained, the Commentary on Boëthius continued to be read and transcribed. ⁱIt was repeatedly averred by writers of the Cistercian following, that the disciples of Abailard and Gilbert had used their trials as a handle for attacking Bernard and the order at large. But only fanatics could speak of either as having founded sects. Neither sought to remove himself out of the comity of catholic Christendom, nor, as we have seen, did the learned or popular opinion of their day so remove them. By the world at large they were still honoured as philosophers and divines³⁰.

^a See Bernard's letters cited above, p. 166 n. 29; Otto i. 48 p. 377; cf. W. de s. Theod. ep. cccxxv. Bern. opp. i. 302.

^f Epist. ad Henric. ix. col. 1322 D; cf. libell., col. 1325 A, 1326. ^g Cf. hist. pont. viii. p. 522; Reuter 2. 12; 1877. ^h Serm. in cantic. lxxx. 9, opp. i. 1549 C. ⁱ Helinand. chr., a. 1148 l. c.; Alberic. chr. a. 1149, l. c.; Vinc. Bellov. spec. hist. xxviii. 86.

³⁰ Compare the significant way in which John of Cornwall, a most correct writer, refers to an opinion of Gilbert's: 'Magister Gilebertus Porretanus, ut multi perhibent, ea docuit... Sed quia super iis aliquid eius scriptum non legi et auditores sui etiam a se invicem dissentiunt, ad alios transeo.' Ad Alex. pap. III. ap. Martene et

CHAP. VI.

It is thus too that John of Salisbury, the pupil of both, regards them. In his historical work he has occasion to relate the proceedings against Gilbert; but in all his other writings he appears simply unconscious that that trial of which he had been an eyewitness ever took place. In the same way he admires Abailard as the master from whom he received his first lessons in dialectic. He criticises his philosophical system, but of anything further he is silent. Nor is his reticence in any degree attributable to delicacy; it is simply that John will not go out of his way to take notice of old wives' fables. To this writer, who has supplied so large a part of the materials for the last three chapters, we now turn. John of Salisbury reflects something of all the characteristics of the school of Chartres of which Gilbert de la Porrée was the most famous product, but his training is wider than the school itself. Before he went there he had caught the dialectical enthusiasm from Abailard: afterwards he brought his trained intellect under a new guidance, and his theology breathes the ethical spirit of Hugh of Saint Victor. He is thus a critic and a dialectician, a humanist and a divine; and it is the balance of his tastes and acquirements that makes him in many respects the fairest type of the learned men of his time.

Durand, Thesaur. nov. Anecd. 5. hardly suspects heresy here; yet 1665 A; Paris 1717 folio. One John was a contemporary.

CHAPTER VII.

JOHN OF SALISBURY.

JOHANNES PARVUS, John Little or Short—^a*little*, according to his own paraphrase, in name, less in skill, least in worth—was born at Salisbury, it seems of English stock¹, about the middle of Henry the First's reign. The year of his birth is commonly given as 1110; but this is evidently a mere calculation from the date of his death, 1180, on the presumption that he was then seventy years old, and it is contradicted by his own ^bstatement that he was but a lad, adolescens admodum, when he went to Paris in 1136. Studies in those days began early, and it is nearly inconceivable that a man of six-and-twenty should enter, as John did, upon a course of education lasting ten or twelve years. We shall certainly be safer then if we place his birth between 1115 and 1120². As a child, ^che tells us, he was sent to a priest, as the

CHAP. VII.

^a Epist. cxcii. max. bibl. patr. 23. 485 f; 1677.

^b Metalog. ii. 10 p. 802.

^c Policrat. ii. 28 pp. 144 sq.

¹ This is a plausible inference from John's language in the Entheticus, ver. 137 sqq., in which he ridicules the courtier who is anxious to pass as a Norman; so that the authors of the Histoire littéraire de la France 14. 89, should seem to be in error in writing his name Petit. See the biography by professor C. Schaarschmidt, now librarian at Bonn, to which reference has frequently been made in the foregoing pages; a model book to which I cannot too heartily express my obligations. My citations from the Entheticus are regularly taken from the edition by C. Petersen, Hamburg 1843, of the Entheticus de dogmate philosophorum, and not to the other poem bearing the same title which is prefixed to the Policraticus. Petersen's commentaries are learned and valuable, but vitiated by a constant endeavour to bring the author into connexion with Oxford, a connexion for which there is absolutely no evidence. Cf. Schaarschmidt 11-21.

² Petersen, p. 73, thinks not before the latter date; Dr Schaarschmidt, p. 10, between 1110 and 1120.

CHAP. VII. manner was, to learn his Psalms. The teacher happened to have a turn for magic, and used his pupils as assistants in his mysterious performances. John, however, proved a disturbing influence: he could see no ghosts, and his services were not again called for.

If this is all we know about his youth, we are very fully informed of his early manhood. The place in the Metalogicus in which he relates the progress of his learning when he went to France is one of those rare autobiographical passages in medieval literature which tell us even more of the life of the time than they do of their immediate subject. John was a witness of the disputes of the schools when they were in their first vigorous activity.

^d Cf. supra,
p. 110.

^d The impulse in dialectical questions which Abailard had excited in the early years of the century had been continually gaining strength since his retirement from Paris. ^e Now in the decline of his hard-beset life he was again teaching there, and it was from him that John received his first lessons in logic. But the student's thirst for all obtainable knowledge would not be satisfied with the expositions of a single master. John seems to have made it his object to learn from as many different sources as possible. He attended the masters of one and then the other side; but his critical faculty was always foremost. Except in politics, where a strong religious sympathy attached him to the hierarchical doctrine of his friend and patron, saint Thomas Becket, he never let himself become a partisan; and his notices of the intellectual struggle of his time are invaluable from their coolness and keen judgement. Hitherto we have used them as illustrating the careers and aims of several of his teachers: we have now to

^e Cf. supra,
p. 161.

consider them as a part of the personal history of the scholar. CHAP. VII.

¹ When as a lad, John says, I first went into Gaul for the cause of study (it was the next year after that the glorious king of the English, Henry the Lion of Righteousness³, departed from human things) I addressed myself to the Peripatetic of Palais, who then presided upon Mount Saint Genovefa, an illustrious teacher and admired of all men. There at his feet I acquired the first rudiments of the dialectical art, and snatched according to the scant measure of my wits,—pro modulo ingenio mei,—whatever passed his lips with entire greediness of mind. Then, when he had departed, all too hastily, as it seemed to me, I joined myself to master Alberic⁴, who stood forth among the rest as a greatly esteemed dialectician, and verily was the bitterest opponent of the nominal sect. Thus Abailard was for a moment upon the scene of his early

³ The title, familiar to students of Mr Freeman, occurs also in the Policraticus vi. 18 p. 371. It indicated the fulfilment of a prophecy of Merlin: Stubbs, Constitutional History of England i. § 111, ed. Oxford 1880.

⁴ It has been supposed that this Alberic of Rheims, Metalog. i. 5 p. 746, was the same person who took the lead in Abailard's prosecution at Soissons in 1121; Brucker, Historia critica Philosophiæ 3. 755, Leipzig 1743 quarto; Schaarschmidt p. 71: and the identification has at least the colour of support from the terms in which John speaks of him, as though he had notoriously signalled himself by his opposition to nominalism. If the facts stated in the Histoire littéraire, 12. 74 sq., are correct, there can be no doubt that Abailard's assailant is the same Alberic who was made archbishop of Bourges in 1136 and who is designated on the occasion of his preferment by pope Innocent the Second, as of Rheims, a specification which also appears in documents of 1128 and 1131. This is also the view taken by Duchesne, In Hist. Calam. not. xxx, Abael. Opp. i. 54, ed. Cousin. Alberic died in 1141. It is evident that these dates will not harmonise with the account given by John of Salisbury of his teacher, who left Paris in 1137 or 1138 in order to continue his studies at Bologna, and that M Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique i. 430, is right in distinguishing the two persons. The confusion evidently arose from the fact that John's master, whom he entitles, in one of his letters, nr clxxii. Max. Bibl. Patr. 23. 467 E, Alberic de Porta Veneris, afterwards became archdeacon of Rheims. The Histoire littéraire introduces a further complication by attempting to distinguish John's master from Alberic de Porta Veneris; but here at least there can be no doubt in the matter. Cf. Petersen 80.

¹ Metal. ii. 20 pp. 802 s1.

CHAP. VII. triumphs; but not now at Paris but near it (as Paris then was) on the hill of Saint Geneviève. When John of Salisbury heard him in 1136, he was once more, at the age of seven-and-fifty, lecturing as he had begun on dialectics. But his return again to public work doubtless reawakened the hostility of teachers and churchmen to which he had previously been exposed. He left his school to Alberic, and John of Salisbury knew him no more as a teacher. His successor was a leading advocate of the logical system which he had spent his life in resisting.

^s Metal. l. c.,
p. 803.

^s Being thus, John continues, for near two whole years occupied on the Mount I had to my instructors in the dialectical art Alberic and master Robert of Melun (that I may designate him by the surname which he hath deserved in the governing of schools; howbeit by nation he is of England): whereof the one was in questions subtil and large, the other in responses lucid, short, and agreeable. They were in some sort counterparts of one another; if the analytical faculty of Alberic had been combined in one person with Robert's clear decision our age could not have shown an equal in debate. For they were both men of sharp intellect, and in study unconquerable . . . Thus much, John adds, for the time that I was conversant with them: for afterwards the one went to Bologna and unlearned that which he had taught; yea, and returned and untaught the same; whether for the better or no, let them judge who heard him before and since. Moreover the other went on to the study of divine letters, and aspired to the glory of a nobler philosophy and a more illustrious name. Whatever may be the exact meaning of the reference to Alberic's defection there is no reason to suppose that there was any lasting estrangement between him and John. In after-years we gather from ^h the latter's correspondence that the master and scholar were good

^h Ep. clxxii, ubi supra,
p. 467 E.

friends, when Alberic was archdeacon of Rheims and John a companion of Becket in exile. In his ¹ Metalogicus too our author includes his old master in a list of the most highly reputed teachers in France. Of Robert of Melun he could not now foretell the future, when as bishop of Hereford, twenty-five years later, he proved a prelate after Henry the Second's own heart and a sturdy combatant against the archbishop's party. At present John knows only his achievements as a theologian, in which quality he was greatly esteemed as a systematic and most orthodox writer⁵. He appears to have set himself as a moderating influence against the reckless application of dialectical theories which was popular in his time. Like Gilbert de la Porrée he ^k placed the idea of God wholly outside the field of human reasoning, and by a careful distinction as to the relation borne by the universe to its Creator, ^l sought to erect an impassable barrier between the two. In thus guarding against the pantheistic issues to which realism was liable, he was obliged to divorce the two spheres of logic and theology which the schools had always been inclined to confuse.

^m With these, proceeds John, I applied myself for the full space of two years, to practice in the commonplaces and rules and other rudimentary elements, which are instilled into the minds of boys and wherein the aforesaid doctors were most able and ready; so that methought I knew all these things as well as my nails and fingers. This at least I had learned, in the lightness of youth to account my knowledge of more worth than it was. I seemed to myself a young scholar, because I was quick in that which I heard. Then returning unto myself and measuring my powers, I advisedly resorted, by the good favour nihil haereticum docuisse certissimum est:' Martene et Durand. Thes. nov. Anecd. 5. 1669 B.

⁵ He is mentioned for instance by John of Cornwall, Ad Alex. III., as one of those 'quos in theologia

CHAP. VII.

¹ Lib. i. 5
p. 746.

1117.

^k Summ. theol., ms. ap. Hauréau, hist. de la philos. scol., i. 492 n.

^l Ibid., p. 493 n.

^m Metal. ii. 10 pp. 803.

CHAP. VII. of my preceptors, to the Grammarian of Conches, and heard his teaching by the space of three years; the while reading much: nor shall I ever regret that time. John therefore turned to grammar after dialectic; he had by this time become conscious of an intellectual appetite which would not be satisfied by the formal routine of logical teaching. Alberic and Robert, he says, might have done good work in physical science had they stood as fast upon the tracks of the elders as they rejoiced in their own discoveries. It was their new-fangled system which he wanted to exchange for the less fashionable but more solid study of grammar. He was therefore glad when an opportunity presented itself for him to attend the master whose ⁿ writings show him chiefly as a natural philosopher, but whom John distinguishes for his peculiar eminence as a grammarian.

ⁿ v. supra,
pp. 124 sq.

John does not name the place where William of Conches taught, but the minute description which he elsewhere gives of the school of Chartres—a description to which particular attention has been directed in a preceding chapter,—not to speak of his many personal reminiscences of its former head Bernard Sylvester and of Gilbert de la Porrée, ^o being at that time chancellor of Chartres, who was afterwards the venerable bishop of Poitiers, leave us in no doubt as to the locality⁶. It was at

^o Metal. i. 5
p. 745.

⁶ This connexion, the importance of which I have attempted to draw out in chapter iv, is due to the acute criticism of Dr Schaarschmidt, p. 22. Of one of his arguments, that William as a Norman was unlikely to have taught at Paris, I have not availed myself for the reason stated above, p. 131 n. 26. I also doubt whether John's words, 'Reperi magistrum Gilbertum,' Metal. ii. 10 p. 805, necessarily imply a previous acquaintance. The general hypothesis indeed, once suggested, appears too obvious to need further confirmation, and I am glad to observe that M Hauréau, who has devoted special attention to the literary history of Chartres, although he had passed the fact by in his two works on the scholastic philosophy and in his singularités historiques et littéraires, now in the Comptes-rendus of the academy of inscriptions for 1873, 3rd series, vol. i. 81, regards it as conclusively established.

Chartres therefore that John laid the foundation of CHAP. VII.
 his classical learning, and under Bernard's successors, William of Conches and Richard l'Évêque⁷; the latter, as he proceeds to explain, *a man whose training was deficient almost in nothing, who had more heart even than speech, more knowledge than skill, more truth than vanity, more virtue than show: and the things I had learned from others I collected all again from him, and certain things too
 I learned which I had not before heard and which appertain to the Quadrivium, wherein formerly I had for some time followed the German Hardwin. I read also again rhetoric, which aforetime I had scarce understood when it was treated of meagrely by master Theodoric, the brother of Bernard, who had before him been chancellor of Chartres and who shared his philosophical, if not exactly his literary, interest. The same I afterwards received more plenteously at the hand of Peter Helias, a teacher who is known to us only as a grammarian, and as a grammarian of high repute⁸; his surviving ^Pworks being a Commentary on* ^P Hist. litt. de la France 12.
486 sq.
 Priscian and two metrical treatises, one a grammar, the other a glossary of rare words. It will not escape notice, as evidence of the breadth of training then demanded from scholastics, that hardly one of John's masters was lecturing on the subject which he had chosen for special and mature study: their general acquirements were

⁷ The words 'Postmodum vero Richardum . . . secutus sum' might lead one to suppose that John attended this master after the three years of which he speaks in relation to William of Conches: but since those years run from 1138, and since his later master Gilbert de la Porrée left Paris in 1141, it is plain that there is no possible interval between the two periods and that Richard's lectures must be included in the former. Even so there remains but a very narrow margin for Gilbert's teaching, and I suspect that John's calculations are not intended to be understood too exactly.

⁸ When Emo, afterward abbat of Werum (Wittewierum) in Groningen, went to study at Paris, Orleans, and Oxford, about 1170, he learned his grammar principally from Priscian and Peter Helias: see the Chronicon Menconis, in Hugo's Sacrae Antiquitatis Monumenta 1. 505.

CHAP. VII. such as to enable them to give competent instruction in almost any branch of what we may call the customary academical curriculum. In the later centuries of the middle ages such an experience would rarely indeed be attainable.

By the time at which John had now arrived he had ceased to be a mere pupil; he was also a private student, and a teacher as well. ^aSince, he says, I received the children of noble persons to instruct, who furnished me with living—for I lacked the help of friends and kinsfolk, but God assuaged my neediness,—the force of duty and the instance of my pupils moved me the oftener to recall what I had learned. Wherefore I made closer acquaintance with master Adam, a man of exceeding sharp wits and, whatever others may think, of much learning, who applied himself above the rest to Aristotle: in such wise that, albeit I had him not to my teacher, he gave me kindly of his, and delivered himself openly enough; the which he was wont to do to none or to few others than his own scholars, for he was deemed to suffer from jealousy. Adam du Petit Pont was an Englishman who ultimately became bishop of Saint Asaph. He had his surname from the school which he afterwards set up on the little bridge connecting the City of Paris with what was perhaps ^ralready known as the Latin Quarter. John had a genuine respect for the logician, whose ^sname he once associates with those of Abailard and Gilbert de la Porrée, as of the scholars to whom he owed most in this department of learning. But his opinion of Adam in his public capacity was very different. ^tAdam's book, the *Art of Reasoning*⁹, he says, was generally considered

^a Metal. ii. 10
p. 804.

A. D. 1175.

^r Schaaschmidt 13 n.
2.

^s Metal. iii.
prol., p. 839.

^t Ibid., iv. 3
p. 883.

⁹ What John calls the Ars disserendi is apparently the treatise entitled in an imperfect manuscript at Paris, De arte dialectica. Some extracts from this work, which have no peculiar interest for us, are printed by Cousin, Fragments philosophiques 2. 386-390.

to have been written with a wilful obscurity of language: CHAP. VII.
although his friends and advocates ascribe this to subtilty, most have explained it as proceeding from the folly or arrogance of a vain man. Adam's pupils of course exaggerated his faults. "They gloried in their own inventions and had " Enthet. ver.
 49-54.
 a great contempt for their elders. Adam encouraged them, having, it should seem, a purely mercenary principle of teaching. "He used to say that he would have " Metal. iii. 3
 p. 853.
few hearers or none if he propounded dialectic with that simplicity of terms and easiness of sentences, with which it ought to be taught. John emphatically disclaims being the pupil of such a man. I was, he adds immediately, his familiar, by constant intercourse and exchange of books, and by almost daily discussion upon such topics of discourse as sprang up. But I was his disciple not for one day.

Thus before the end of five years of student life John was already entering on the career of a teacher: but to his earnest mind this resolve necessitated a further training at least equally extended. He returned to Paris and applied himself to the study of theology.
 The language in which he relates this movement leaves no doubt that the interval between his attendance on William of Conches and his masters in divinity was not spent at Paris. For the most of it presumably he remained at Chartres; the spirit of that school has left an impress upon his mind so deep and uneffaceable that we cannot be persuaded but his residence there was continued as long as possible; although a reference in a letter which he wrote in later years to Peter de la Celle has suggested the ^yconjecture that he lived some y Schaar-schmidt 23.
 time at Rheims. Paris however was already tending rapidly to become the intellectual metropolis of Europe and a poor man like John would be sure to turn his

CHAP. VII. steps thither in the hope of getting employment, for it was poverty that arrested him in the middle of the Quadrivium course to which he had been introduced by Hardwin and Richard. From hence, he says, I was withdrawn by the straitness of my private estate, the instance of my companions, and the counsel of my friends, that I should undertake the office of a teacher. I obeyed: and thus returning at the expiration of three years, I found master Gilbert and heard him in logic and divinity; but too quickly was he removed. He had accepted, as ^awe have seen, an office at Poitiers, from which he was soon advanced to the bishoprick of that city. *His successor, proceeds John, was Robert Pullus, whom his life and knowledge alike recommended. Then I had Simon of Poissy, a trusty lecturer, but dull in disputation. But these two I had in theologies alone. Thus, engaged in diverse studies near twelve years passed by me*¹⁰.

^a Supra, p. 133.

No doubt the reason why John adverts so perfunctorily to his theological studies is that the entire narrative upon which we have hitherto commented is inserted in the middle of a dialectical disquisition. Dialectics furnish its motive, and beyond them John does not think fit to pursue his story. Gilbert de la Porrée he heard in dialectics as well as theology: then he attended Robert and Simon; but these, he explains, as though to excuse his not continuing a digression from his principal subject, I heard in theologies alone. Nor can we allow ourselves to be detained by an enquiry as to the influence which these masters had upon him. ^aThe character, the transcendental character, we should say, of Gilbert's theo-

^a Supra, pp. 179-182.

¹⁰ The editions have duodecennium or duodennium; the former of which I take to be a gloss upon the latter. Duodennium however itself is considered by Dr Schaarschmidt, pp. 24 sq., to be a corruption from decennium: yet compare above, p. 207 n. 7.

logical system has been already sufficiently discussed; CHAP. VII.
 but John was his pupil but for a short time. Robert Pulleyn also (if this is to be preferred of the many forms in which his name is written) did not remain long at Paris; and of Simon of Poissy we know next to nothing. Robert was undoubtedly held by his contemporaries in singular honour as a theologian, although it has been suspected that his famous Sum of Theology borrowed something more than its method from Abailard¹¹: but it is impossible to conjecture in what particular branch of his faculty John of Salisbury heard him. Probably enough the lessons which John attended were merely concerned with the exposition of the Scriptures. At any rate the tone of the scholar's theology is manifestly derived from another source than that of the teachers mentioned. The spirit of humanism, in fact, which was the distinctive essence of the school of Chartres, he brought into alliance with a totally different spirit derived unmistakably from the mysticism of Hugh of Saint Victor. The union was no doubt exceptional, for the ethical theology of the Victorines was rather calculated to recommend the life of a recluse than to countenance the wide interests and the wide reading of a man like John of Salisbury; yet as his writings show, it is this ethical principle far more than any metaphysical or dogmatic system, that ruled his thoughts. To this characteristic of him we shall revert hereafter: at the present moment we notice it, as John notices his theological studies, just incidentally. Besides there is no evidence that Hugh, whom John only refers to twice in all his works, was ever actually his teacher; the ¹¹ See Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique, I. 484. The work in question, Roberti Pulli sententiarum libri viii, Paris 1655 folio, I have not had an opportunity of consulting.

CHAP. VII. current may have been communicated as effectively by private association with Hugh or with fellow-members of the abbey.

John concludes the record of his school-studies in a curious epilogue, half-humorous, half-grave, which shows how far his sympathy had been withdrawn through his later training, from the absorbing religion of Saint Geneviève into which he had entered with such breathless ardour twelve years previously. ^b And so, he says, it seemed pleasant to me to revisit my old companions on the Mount, whom I had left and whom dialectic still detained, to confer with them touching old matters of debate; that we might by mutual comparison measure together our several progress. I found them as before, and where they were before; nor did they appear to have reached the goal in unravelling the old questions, nor had they added one jot of a proposition. The aims that once inspired them, inspired them still: they only had progressed in one point, they had unlearned moderation, they knew not modesty; in such wise that one might despair of their recovery. And thus experience taught me a manifest conclusion, that, whereas dialectic furthers other studies, so if it remain by itself it lies bloodless and barren, nor does it quicken the soul to yield fruit of philosophy, except the same conceive from elsewhere.

^b Metal. ii. 10
p. 805.

Such was John's final judgement on the ruling passion of his time: he felt that he had outgrown logic when he advanced to the study of theology. Still throughout his life, though he esteemed theology as the noblest subject on which the mind could exercise itself, his sympathies ran even more strongly to yet another branch of learning, the study of the classics. The external events of his career hardly concern us, and may be briefly summarised.

^c Schaar-
schmidt 27.

On the completion of his theological course ^c he spent some time with his friend Peter, abbat of the Cistercian CHAP. VII.

monastery of Moustier la Celle near Rheims, and afterwards his own successor in the see of Chartres¹². Here in 1148 he had the opportunity of witnessing that council at Rheims in which saint Bernard failed to silence Gilbert de la Porrée, and of which we have ^aJohn's ^dHist. pontif. record, pointed with characteristic shrewd criticism. ^{viii, ix, Pertz}
Here too he must have been admitted to friendly inter- ^{20. 522 sqq.,} course with the redoubtable abbat of Clairvaux, who ^{525.} soon afterwards recommended him to the notice and ^eBern. epist. favour of archbishop Theobald of Canterbury¹³. The ^{ccclxi, opp. 1.} latter had also been present at the Rheims council and ^{325 B. ed.} had there, it seems, made John's acquaintance. He ac- ^{Mabillon.}
cordingly received him the more readily and at once attached him to his clerical establishment. For the next fifteen years or so John was constantly employed not only in the administrative routine of the primate's court, but also in delicate negotiations with the Roman curia. He was the firm and intimate friend of the English pope Hadrian the Fourth, and was the 'agent by means of whom the latter's sanction was obtained to king Henry the Second's conquest of Ireland. Writing in 1159 he says, ^fMetal. iv. 42 ^{p. 929.}
^g*I have ten times passed the chain of the Alps* ^{Lib. iii.}
^h*on my road from England; I have twice*¹⁴ traversed Apulia. ^{prol., p. 838.}

¹² There is no reason to suppose with Dr Schaarschmidt, p. 25, that Peter was John's junior. He certainly survived the latter by seven years, but John died at the age of only sixty or sixty-five, and Peter as bishop of Chartres is described as old and infirm.

¹³ Mabillon, in loc., dates the letter 1144; but Bernard says, 'Praesens vobis commendaveram eum,' and now that we know of an occasion on which the three were together, namely, at Rheims in the spring of 1148, it is needless to conjecture any other. The letter however cannot have been written long after the council, since John in the autumn of 1159 speaks of having been nearly twelve years, 'annis fere duodecim,' employed in the business of the court: Polier., prol., p. 3.

¹⁴ For secundo we should naturally expect bis, which I imagine must have been the original reading. At all events it is certain that John was in Apulia before 1154 'regnante

CHAP. VII. The business of my lords and friends I have often transacted in the Roman church, and as sundry causes arose I have many times travelled not only round England but also Gaul.

John's position as secretary to archbishop Theobald, and afterwards to his successors, Thomas Becket and Richard, doubtless disposed him to form those hierarchical views which we find ^b expressed with such emphasis in his Policraticus. Nowhere could he find the conflicting claims of secular and ecclesiastical jurisdiction more clamorous for solution; nor had he any hesitation in deciding that the independence, the supremacy, of the church was essentially bound up with the existence of Christianity. Holding these principles, it does not surprise us to learn that ¹ for some reason, the details have not survived, he fell into the king's displeasure. Whether for the time he had to give up his post we are not told; but it is certain that his income was withdrawn, and that he had to struggle with poverty and debt, as well as with danger menacing his personal safety. It is to this interval of enforced idleness that we owe the production of his two most important works, the Policraticus and the Metalogicus. ^k Both were written during the time when the king was absent at the tedious siege of Toulouse in 1159: ¹ the one was completed before, the other just after, the death of Hadrian the Fourth on the last day of August in that year. The storm which had impended over John of Salisbury seemed soon to have passed by: but in 1161 his patron, archbishop Theobald, died, and the favour which was continued to him by Thomas Becket came to be a source of anxiety rather than of advantage. After an absence of five years king Henry was again in Eng-

^b Policr. iv. 3 p. 212; v. 2 pp. 251 sq.; &c.

¹ v. Schaarschmidt 32 sqq.

^k Policr., prol., p. 6; viii. 25 p. 693; metal. iv. 42 p. 929.
¹ Policr. viii. 23 p. 681; metal., l. c.

Rogero,' Policr. vii. 19 p. 479; and again in company with pope Hadrian, i. e. between 1154 and 1159, ibid., lib. vi. 24 p. 386.

land in 1163. The fact possibly determined Salisbury's withdrawal¹⁵. He left the country only to return with Becket seven years later, and to witness his murder. During this time of exile he was the truest, because the wisest, champion of the archbishop. The intemperate and wanton means by which the latter sought to promote his cause, John was the first to reprove. He did not spare his warnings, and, when necessary, would denounce Becket's actions not as impolitic but simply as unchristian¹⁶. Still his hearty adhesion to the hierarchical principle with which Becket was popularly identified, made him stand firmly by his chief. In the revulsion of general feeling that followed his murder, John was reestablished in the court at Canterbury, and finally in 1176 his loyalty to the cause was rewarded by his elevation to the bishopric of the city in which so large a part of his student-life had been passed, and to which he owed his introduction to classical learning. He was bishop of Chartres however only for four years;

¹⁵ He again found hospitality at the hands of Peter de la Celle, who was now abbat of Saint Rémy at Rheims, Schaarschmidt 40; and it was undoubtedly at this time that he wrote the Historia pontificalis which internal notices prove to have been written in 1162 or 1163 (see Giesebrecht, Sitzungsberichte der philosophisch-philologischen und historischen Classe der königlichen Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 3. 124) and which is dedicated to the abbat. As to the date, I am strongly inclined to connect John's departure with the king's return in January 1163 (Stubbs §139); so that we may fix the composition of the Historia pontificalis precisely to that year. Whether it was at this time or during his former stay with Peter de la Celle that John acted as the latter's clerk, 'quondam clericus noster,' as Peter wrote in 1176, Ep. vii. 6, Max. Biblioth. Patr. 23. 886 c, it is perhaps impossible to decide: Dr Schaarschmidt, p. 26, seems to think it was on the earlier occasion.

¹⁶ See a pointed example in a letter addressed to Becket, to which Dr Schaarschmidt, p. 47 n. 3, draws attention. Among other things John says, 'Si enim litterarum vestrarum et ipsius (Becket's reply and his opponent's letter) articuli singuli conferantur, ex amaritudine potius et rancore animi quam ex caritatis sinceritate videbitur processisse responsio.' He would not treat the pope's courier with the contumely which Becket had thought fit to use towards a cardinal legate of the apostolic see: Epist. ccxii, ubi supra, p. 494 E, F.

CHAP. VII. he died in 1180 and was succeeded by his life-long friend Peter de la Celle.

^m Cf. Schaarschmidt 295.

^m The quality that first strikes one in reading the works of John of Salisbury—and they stand nearly alone in mediæval literature for the wide circle of readers to which they appeal—is what almost may be described as their modern spirit. It is this, we suspect, which has laid their author open to the charge of cynical indifference and insincerity. His judgement is generally so liberal that it is perhaps difficult for those who merely read him in snatches, as the older classical scholars used to do, to believe that it is genuine. Yet it is in this freedom of outlook that John's individual distinction as a writer lies. There are some things in respect to which nothing would induce him to relax his positiveness. These are the affairs, the interests, of religion; and these, especially in the political atmosphere of John's time covered a large enough field: for all knowledge, all thought, all the facts of life were to be estimated by reference to the supreme arbitration of theology¹⁷. Yet even this exemption leaves a considerable space for free and irresponsible questioning, and John is evidently seen at his best when, having made the necessary stipulations and reservations in favour of orthodoxy, he can range at pleasure among the memories of antiquity, and illustrate whatever comes to hand from the stores of his classical reading or from the shrewd observation of his own experience.

The Policraticus, John's most extensive work, allows full play to his characteristic genius: indeed the multitude of digressions and episodes which enliven its course is apt to distract one from appreciating its real purpose. It cannot be fairly called a satire upon the society of the time; while on the other hand it is far from being a methodical treatise on morals. The former description has this excuse, that the author touches with a light hand the follies he sees about him; but the satire, like Juvenal's, is prompted by a deep underlying seriousness: nor is it in any way the motive of the book, in which the positive ethical element greatly preponderates. The title, according to the only plausible interpretation that has been put upon it, designates it as *The Statesman's Book*¹⁸: its alternative, sive de Nugis Curialium et Vestigiis Philosophorum, marks its two-fold aim. But the first part of the work is by no means mainly critical: the vanities of courts are thus styled by comparison with the more solid realities of philosophy which form the subject of the second part. The former deals with politics in the wide acceptation of the term, the latter with what one may term the internal polity of a man's self.

¹⁷ Cum cunctas artes, cum dogmata cuncta peritus Noverit, imperium pagina sacra tenet: Enthet. 373 sq.

John begins in the first three books by clearing away the obstacles to the healthy life of the state, the vices and follies that impede its motion: in the next three he makes the first attempt since Augustin to frame an ideal system of government, on the basis of the necessary subordination of the secular to the religious state; a view to which we shall have occasion to return hereafter. In the second section of the work, the last two books, John passes to the individual: he proceeds from a review of the different schools of philosophy to lay down the principles of true knowledge, and seeks to determine the ¹⁸ Dr Schaarschmidt's suggestion, p. 145, is that John knew the Greek name Polycrates and supposed it to be derived from πόλις. Hence he formed his title, with no doubt an implied play on the meaning of the word town.

CHAP. VII. aim of philosophy, the assertion of the supremacy of the spirit over the senses, of the ideal over the material. The latter part of the Policraticus covers substantially the same ground, although with far greater elaboration and relative completeness, as the elegiac poem, the Entheticus, which John appears to have originally written as an introduction to it. The latter is however by no means superseded by the prose work, and we can readily forgive the jejune rhythm of its imitation of Ovid for the pointed epigrammatic accuracy with which it depicts the learning and manners of the day. The framework of the Policraticus gives but a slight notion of the variety of its contents. It is to some extent an encyclopædia of the cultivated thought of the middle of the twelfth century. As an authority for the political history of the time, for the history of learning and philosophy, it is invaluable for the simple reason that it is not a professed history. The facts are introduced naturally, for illustration; and not on account of their intrinsic or obvious importance. The general liberality of sentiment to which the work bears witness is all the more significant because of its author's eminence in the religious world, which in turn gave his work a wider influence than if he had been suspected of making a compromise between orthodoxy and profane learning. Such men by their silent help towards raising the intelligence of their age have often done more than the ambitious protestant against established creeds or the wilful martyr of theological idiosyncrasy.

From the abundant materials offered by John of Salisbury's works we can only select two points for observation: one relates to his use of the classics, the other to his position in regard to the philosophy of the time. The distinctive mark of the Policraticus is a CHAP. VII. humanism which seems to remove it from medieval associations. Beyond dispute the best-read man of his time ¹⁹, no one is fonder than John of illustrating by quotation or anecdote every statement he makes; and the illustrations are taken, as if by preference, from the classics more frequently than from the Bible. No doubt ^a he disclaims any idea of treating the two as coördinate: ^a Policr. vii. 10 p. 443. yet in ethical and even in theological matters he repeatedly confirms and, as it were, recommends the authority of Scripture by that of Plato or of Latin antiquity, just as though he had been the pupil of Abailard in other things besides dialectic. John's classical predilections assisted in his case a confusion of thought with which the happy ambiguity of the word scriptura had a good deal to do. ^o Whatsoever things were written ^o Rom. xv. 4. aforetime were written for our learning, he would ^p like to ^p Policr. vii., prol., p. 408. understand of literature at large; and he quotes the maxim of saint Jerom, ^q Love the knowledge of the Scrip- ^q Cap. 10 p. 445. tures and thou wilt not love the lusts of the flesh, in proof of the advantage that springs from all reading. He is speaking now of the study of the classics, and ^r warns us ^r p. 444. so to read them that authority do not prejudice to reason. Authority here is that of the masters of antiquity, and reason is the mental faculty considered as educated and enlightened by Christianity. The typical opposites have for the moment changed places; and the change is highly indicative of the regard in which the classics could now be held even by men the correctness of whose religious character was no less assured than was that, let us say,

¹⁹ In relation to the extent of his classical reading it is curious that John appears ignorant of the works of Lucretius, especially since, as we have said above, p. 118, Bernard of Chartres had a special devotion to them as models of verse composition.

CHAP. VII. of the arch-enemy of learning, the champion of a 'rustic' faith, saint Peter Damiani, a century earlier.

John's classical tastes had no small share in determining his attitude towards the philosophy and especially the dialectics of his time. We have seen from the language in which he concludes the narrative of his youthful studies, how dissatisfied he was with the prevalent method of teaching logic. The nominalists had brought it into vogue as a means of asserting the rights of human reason; the realists had been driven to cultivate it in support of the religious tradition: but now both parties were subdued by the overmastering sway of argumentation. Dialectics had become not a means but an end; its professors were interested not to discover truth but to prove their superiority over rival disputants. The result was a competitive system of smatterers and sophists. The first period in the medieval study of logic had in fact passed its zenith and was already nearing its fall. A new one arose in the following century, far more important from a scientific point of view, but really less characteristic for the history of western culture because its materials were imported ready-made and in gross from Byzantine compilations and from the Arabic versions of Aristotle. It was not like the older western logic, of native growth, painfully preserved through dim ages, and in some remarkable cases depending for existence upon the chance survival of a single seed, which sent the acutest observer back upon his own mental resources even to guess at the form and structure of the mature organism. At the time however with which we are concerned logic had for the most part been degraded into idle casuistry and trifling; it had fallen into the hands of inferior men. The name of Aristotle was dragged down by people who, in 'William of Conches' phrase, were not worthy to be his scullions; and these conceited pretenders—even "Adam du Petit Pont, who knew better—designedly made their lessons as obscure and intricate as possible, in order to attract pupils who learned only for display²⁰. The more capable teachers were gradually forsaking the schools or else giving themselves up to theology, to natural science, or to some other study which was not so much infested by the noisy crowd.

* Metal. ii. 7
pp. 797 sq.

John of Salisbury therefore, who had praise only for sound and honest work, and for the modesty and tolerance of the true philosopher, early parted company with the professional dialecticians. Afterwards at Canterbury, where though he did not perhaps actually occupy the post of a teacher, * he seems to have been regarded in some sort as the representative of learning in the court, he was constrained to take up the defence of those principles of knowledge which he had acquired at Chartres, against the vain substitutes for it which were everywhere forcing themselves into notice. His Metalogicus supposes a state of things somewhat different from, somewhat more degenerate than, that to which we have just now alluded. His opponents were not solely the logical fanatics whose acquaintance he had made at Paris, although † they were as fond of splitting hairs. On the contrary they were animated by an impartial contempt for all the educational tradition of the schools: logic they scorned as heartily as they did grammar, and were con-

CHAP. VII.
 † Dragmat.
 iii. p. 80.
 * v. supra,
 pp. 208 sq.

* Metal.,
 prol., p. 732.

† Lib. i. 3 p.
 740.

²⁰ William of Conches has more than one description of these coxcombs; see below Appendix vi and vii. Compare too the Dragmaticon (De substt. phys.) iii. p. 63: 'In nugis sunt subtiles, in necessariis tardi et hebetes, sed ne nil fecisse cum repatriaverint videantur, ex

pellibus vitulinis bene pumicatis et levigatis cum amplis interlineis libros componi faciunt, eosque copertoriis rubeis et impressis vestiunt: sicque cum sapiente sacculo et insipiente animo ad parentes suos recurrunt.'

CHAP. VII. fident of becoming philosophers by rule of thumb. John had no difficulty in combating this supercilious position, but the interest of his treatise is that it gives him occasion to discuss at large his favourite theme of the interdependence of the several 'arts' that relate to the laws and functions of language, in other words, of the Trivium: for he maintains it is only by a thorough study of grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, considered as mutually connected and auxiliary, that we can lay the foundations of genuine knowledge. ^aDialectic itself, valuable and necessary as it is, is like the sword of Hercules in a Pigmy's hand unless there be added to it the accoutrement of the other sciences.

^a Lib. ii. 9 p. 801.

^a Prantl, gesch. d. logik 2. 238 sq., Schaarschmidt 117-122, 215 sq.

^b Metal. ii. 20 p. 837.

^c Policr., prol., p. 5.

^d Lib. vii. 2 pp. 411 sqq.

The Metalogicus has in one respect a peculiar value: ^ait is the first work in the middle ages in which the whole of Aristotle's Organon is turned to account. Having thus a surer basis to build upon than any of his predecessors, John relies entirely upon Aristotle for his logical theory. In reference to the crucial question of the universals he is the loyal disciple of Abailard, whose principles he elaborates from the newly discovered source. But even on a point to which supreme importance was attached by his contemporaries John declines to be positive: he chooses the conclusion of Aristotle not because of its absolute scientific truth but ^b*because it is the best adapted to the study of logic*. For the same reason, except in this one department of learning, he avows his allegiance to Plato, whose general view of things he accepts by reason of the free range it concedes to enquiry and speculation. ^c*I am not ashamed*, he once says, to number myself among the academics, since in those things about which a wise man may doubt, I depart not from their footsteps. It is ^dnot that he is in favour of a general scepticism, far less of a general indecision and vacillation. ° Certain facts John conceives to be irrefragably established by authority; others stand on a secure foundation of reason: but there is a large class of problems in reference to which he holds his judgement in suspense, because they are not definitely solved by either of the prime arbiters of truth, nor yet verified by observation. Accordingly he gives a long and most curious list of things about which a wise man may doubt . . . so however, he prudently adds, that the doubt extend not to the multitude. The items are strangely mixed; they bring into vivid light on the one hand the immense interval between the certainties of modern knowledge and the vague gropings that had to serve for physical science in John's age, and on the other the eternal limitations of the human mind which forbid the elevation of metaphysics or theology to the dignity of an exact science.

In reading this catalogue one cannot repress the thought, how many sects and divisions, how much hatred and cursing, would have been spared the church in other ages and in our own time, had men been willing to confess with John of Salisbury that there are many questions which every man has a right to answer or to leave unanswered for himself. Among these John reckons providence and fate, chance and free will; even those things which are reverently enquired about God himself, who surpasses the examination of all rational nature and is exalted above all that the mind can conceive. Other questions which are included in the same liberal enumeration—the nature and origin of the soul; matter and motion; the causes and beginnings of things; the use and end of virtues and vices, and their source; whether a man who has one virtue has all virtues, and whether all sins are equal and equally to

CHAP. VII.
pp. 413 sq.

HAF. VII. be punished—may appear to have a less direct bearing upon theology; but it will not escape observation that hardly one of them but has come to make part, if not of the formal creed, still of the accepted tradition of some one of the sects of Christendom. In the middle ages the connexion was the more closely felt because theology was almost universally the standard of knowledge, the test by which the goodness of a philosophical tenet was tried. We do not indeed presume to say that John of Salisbury calculated the issues to which he committed himself; certainly if any connexion of the sort just named could be proved he would have been the first to withdraw the problem in question out of the class of 'doubtfuls.' Still it is his signal virtue, a virtue which, if we mistake not, he derived immediately from Bernard of Chartres, that, although he held as strongly as any man to the principle just mentioned, he distinctly limited it to facts with regard to which authority was precise, and left the rest open questions.

He did more than this: he enlarged the conception of authority; for the divine influence, he maintained with Abailard, is not to be sought only in the written revelation but in its indwelling in man's reason.

In thet.,
r. 629-636.

'Est hominis ratio summae rationis imago
Quae capit interius vera docente Deo.
Ut data lux oculis tam se quam cetera monstrat
Quae sub luce patent et sine luce latent,
Claraque fit nubes concepto lumine solis,
Cum dependentes flatus abegit aquas:
Subdita sic ratio formam summae rationis
Sordibus expulsis induit, inde micat.

Polier. iii. x
v. 150 sqq.

The reasonable soul is God, by participation in whom all things exist: the good man therefore, for virtue is the antecedent of the right exercise of reason, may be trusted to know. It is thus that John is able to declare that ^hfreedom is the most glorious of all things, because it is inseparable from, if not identical with, virtue.

CHAP. VII.

^h Lib. vii. 25
p. 526.

John of Salisbury is the youngest exponent of a great and vigorous intellectual movement. The generation of its founders began in the last quarter of the eleventh century; John carries on its current into the last quarter of the twelfth. But the tide has been already long ebbing, and the thirteenth century hardly begins before ⁱthe Physics of Aristotle, now first made known to the Latin world, are solemnly interdicted by a council at Paris; a few years later ^kthe proscription is extended to the *Metaphysics*²¹. That was in fact the meeting-time of two eras, and the opening of the new period of philosophical progress created by the importation of the works of Aristotle, was threatened, as the efforts of Roscelin and Abailard had been, by the anathema of the church. Now, however, a reconciliation was soon arranged; and the church herself had the glory of claiming as her own the men who reared the stupendous fabric of the mature scholastic philosophy. Into this, the second and greater, period in the history of scholasticism²² we do not propose to enter; its magnitude and importance make it a subject by itself. In the following chapters our attention will be confined to a small department of it, one to which we are naturally led, since of the theories formed in the middle ages respecting the nature and functions of the state John of Salisbury's is the first that aspires to a philosophical character.

ⁱ Du Boulay,
hist. univ.
Paris. 3. 57.

A. D. 1209.

^k Ibid., p. 82.
A. D. 1215.

²¹ The general fact of this condemnation is clear, though it is also certain that a confusion arose with John Scot's work, on account, no doubt, of its title Περὶ φύσεων μετὰ σπουδῆς. See Jourdain in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscripti-

tions 26(2) 486-489, Haureau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique 2(1) 100-106.

²² I have no hesitation in adopting M Haureau's division, vol. 1. 40 sq., as obviously the most logical. Compare above, p. 1.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE HIERARCHICAL DOCTRINE OF THE STATE.

CHAP. VIII. AMONG the facts which make the eleventh century a turning-point in the history of society,—whether we look to the intellectual movement or to the consolidation of the feudal system, to the arousing of a national force in France and England under stress of northern invaders, or to the restoration of the imperial or the ecclesiastical dignity;—among the incidents in this general change, none was attended with such wide-reaching consequences as the new position claimed for the catholic church. It might seem as though, just at the moment when nations were beginning to realise their strength and to some extent acquiring even an individual consciousness, the church intervened and sought to merge them all in one confused mass, subject and submissive to her will. Yet evidently the churchmen were only doing their duty when they felt and confessed that the work of repairing society belonged of right to them; nor could they discover any secret for the efficiency of the church's action more natural than a lofty assertion of her right to control the secular state and make her counsels the guide of the world. The enunciation of this policy opened a new channel of thought and discussion quite independent of that stream of which we have observed the rise in the foregoing chapters:

from it flowed a literature appropriated to the exposition of the theory of politics, and in special of the relations of church and state¹. It is not our purpose here to examine in any detail the hierarchical scheme which is identified with the person and history of the arch-deacon Hildebrand, the pope Gregory the Seventh; but there are some general considerations with regard to it which it is important to bear in mind, in order to understand the conditions under which men wrote.

However little we may approve the methods by which Gregory laid the foundations of the papal power², however much we may judge them to have been warped by private ambition, however much defiled by arrogance and cruelty, it would be idle to deny the essential nobility of the conception, which ultimately rested on the necessity of reforming the church as preliminary to the reformation of the world. [It was plain that society could not be purified by an instrument as corrupt as itself; and such had been the condition of the church, at least until the middle of the eleventh century. The crying evil was that it was becoming more and more a part of the state, the clergy entering more and more

¹ In this and the following chapter I am largely indebted to the references contained in two very compendious tracts by professor Emil Friedberg of Leipzig entitled, Die mittelalterlichen Lehren über das Verhältniss von Staat und Kirche; 1874.

² I do not know whether it is necessary to discuss the theory of modern curialists, e.g. of cardinal Hergenroether, Katholische Kirche und christlicher Staat in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung 234 &c., 2nd ed., Freiburg 1876, that Gregory did little more than carry into effect principles for which his predecessors had failed to find opportunity. The cardinal's book is in fact difficult to treat except as a controversial and ephemeral production, one of the crowd of big pamphlets called forth by 'Janus.' This character is clearly indicated in the second edition, in which the polemic comes first, and the historical part appears not as basis but as a sort of justificatory appendix. Besides, the text is so dogmatic and the literature so vague and unsatisfactory, that it is almost hopeless to meet the writer, as one would wish, fairly on his own ground.

CHAP. VIII. into the enjoyments, the luxury, the profligacy of civil life. Reform, it was felt, must begin by severing this alliance and constituting the clergy as a class, a caste, by themselves, to offer a pattern of purity and self-devotedness to the laity. To us possibly, with the experience of eight centuries, it may appear that such a scheme was destined by its very nature to fail of its true objects, and that the character of the clergy and their spiritual and moral influence would have been better secured by placing them, with the intrinsic power of their office, not over but among the people. [In fact there was perhaps³ no surer means towards the degradation of an order than to absolve it from social restraints and to enforce upon it a special code of morals which not all desired to keep and which many, if not most, found it easy to elude. At the same time the preponderant balance of church authority was precise against the toleration of married clergy, and this part of the reform was rightly defended as a recurrence to patristic, if not to primitive, usage. Moreover the sharper the distinction, the separation, between clergy and laity, the more readily could the former be applied as an external and consolidated force against the disorders of civil society. [On general grounds it is perfectly clear that if the church was to exercise that sway which all Christians tores a populo timeri . . . Res,' adds the narrator, Aeneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius the Second, 'erat complurimis accepta; sed tempori non convenire. . . . Quidam senes damnabant quod assequi non poterant. Religiosi, quia voto astricti erant continentiae, haud libenter audiebant, presbyteris concedi saecularibus quod sibi negaretur:'. De rebus Basileae gestis commentarius, in C. Fea's Pius Secundus a Calumniis vindicatus 57 sq., Rome 1823.

³ John bishop of Luebeck at the council of Basle 1434 made a proposition to the delegates 'ut sacerdotibus Christi nuptias restituerent: . . . inutiliter uxores esse preceptas sacerdotibus; vix inter mille unum reperiri continentem presbyterum, omnes aut concubinos, aut adulteros, aut quod peius est, inveniri: . . . amicitiae vinculum inter laicos clericosque hac disparitate servari non posse; omnes sacerdotes quasi pudicitiae maritalis expugna-

agreed it ought to exercise, over the consciences of men, it must be as free as possible from those ties which bound it to the secular state; if, for instance, the churchman had to look to his king for preferment, he was not likely to be as vigilant or as courageous in the carrying out of his duty as if he depended solely upon his spiritual chief⁴. The isolation and independence of the clergy being then postulated, it was but a step further to assert their superiority, their right of controlling the state. *Gregory had a search made in the papal archives and found what he believed to be irrefragable evidence of the feudal dependence of the different kingdoms on the Roman see. Civil power,—so he wrote to bishop Hermann of Metz,—was the invention of worldly men, ignorant of God and prompted by the devil⁵; it needed not only the assistance but the authorisation of the church.

CHAP. VIII.
Epist. vi
23 Jaffé 2.
468 sq.; cf.
I. von Doellinger, die papst-fabeln des mittelalters 84.
March 15,
1081.

Viewing the new policy in its first rudiments, we cannot fail to detect an inevitable source of weakness, so far as its essential aims were concerned. It made demands on the clergy (and a fortiori on the pope, for whom was arrogated a virtual omnipotence on earth) which could hardly be satisfied in a far higher stage of civilisation. In a word it was theoretical, ideal, visionary. As soon as it was brought into the sphere of practice, so soon as the church entered into conflict with the state, it became

⁴ It is curious that Manegold in his letter to Gebhard dwells upon the disadvantage to the people of royal patronage because kingdoms being extensive and including various nationalities, it might and did happen that persons were appointed to preferments in a district the very language of which they did not understand. See Hartwig Floto, Kaiser Heinrich der Vierte 2. 302, Stuttgart 1856. It is unnecessary to allude to the practices in regard to foreign preferments which resulted from papal patronage.

⁵ Quis nesciat reges et duces ab iis habuisse principium qui, deum ignorantes, superbia, rapinis, perfidia, homicidiis, postremo universis pene sceleribus, mundi principe diabolo videlicet agitante, super pares, scilicet homines, dominari caeca cupidine et intolerabili praesumptione affectaverunt?—Epist. viii. 21 Jaffé, Biblioth. Rer. Germ. 2. 457.

CHAP. VIII. evident that the unworldliness assumed in the church only existed in so far that she had no material forces to rely upon; although the weapon of excommunication which she wielded was in fact by far more powerful than any forces that the secular state possessed. If the clergy were free from civil control, society on the other hand had little or no protection against their license. To make the high ecclesiastical officers proudly independent of the sovereign was to introduce the influence of the Roman see into every court, and to put canonical obedience in danger of becoming a matter of common politics. If ecclesiastical property was released from civil obligation, the church was as much as before subject to the cares and the temptations of wealth. The spiritual basis of the hierarchical pretensions in fact at once broke down on trial. The pope by aspiring to universal dominion, fell to the position of a sovereign among sovereigns; he became a disturbing influence in the political system of Europe, and the most religious of men were constantly troubled to reconcile their duty towards their country with what they believed to be their duty towards God.

The Hildebrandine policy thus contained within it the seeds of danger alike to society and to the church itself. But, over and above these intrinsic defects, the idea of a catholic church was confronted and menaced by another idea that did not yield to it in the magnificence and universality of its pretensions. The circumstances of the time brought the pope into peculiar relations with Italy and Germany, the inheritors of the title and traditions of the Roman empire. ^b Hitherto the emperor had been understood to represent on earth the unity and order of the divine government, holding in the secular estate a rank equal, and often very far superior, to that occupied by the pope in the spiritual. He was the vicegerent of God; that title had not yet been arrogated to itself by the papacy. With such a doctrine Gregory would have nothing to do; his attitude with respect to it was unequivocally, defiantly revolutionary. He treated civil government at large as a human institution 'so deeply polluted by its sinful origin,—Cain and Nimrod, it was commonly explained, were its first founders,—as to be by itself helpless and criminal. Between the two opposing principles no compromise, no lasting peace was possible. But the points on which we would dwell are not so much the broad issues raised in the interminable controversy, as the incidental consequences that were drawn from them. [There are few facts more striking than the readiness with which the church admitted any form of civil government that would listen to her claims. Theoretically she had no preference for monarchical institutions; rather, it should seem, she was inclined to promote a democratic sentiment. Granted only the superiority of the ecclesiastical power, there was no concession she would not make in favour of popular rights: and her advocates speak, now with the voice of 'revolution-whigs,' of the official character of kingship; now with the earnestness of Cromwell's independents, of the necessity, the duty, of tyrannicide⁶. Those passages of the New Testament which

^b Cf. Floto 2. 286 sqq.

CHAP. VIII.
—
⁶ Cf. Aug. Triumph. de potest. eccles. xxxvi. 1 p. 212 b, ed. Rome 1582 folio.

⁶ The agreement has been often remarked. Sir Robert Filmer says of the doctrine that mankind is naturally at liberty to choose its government, 'This tenet was first hatched in the schools, and hath been fostered by all succeeding papists for good divinity. The divines also of the reformed churches have entertained it, and the common people everywhere tenderly embrace it,' &c. Then with reference to the 'perillous conclusion' drawn from this maxim, namely, that the people have power to 'punish or deprive' their sovereign, he adds, 'Cardinal Bellarmine and Calvine both look asquint this way:' Patriarcha i. 1 pp 2 sqq.; 1680.

CHAP. VIII. have been held to bespeak a divine right for kings are completely ignored, and the hierarchical pamphleteers, almost without exception, draw their lessons from the theocratic, or rather sacerdotal, teaching of the Hebrew scriptures or from the commonplaces of classical history.

The most interesting example of this method is to be found in a letter written by Manegold, a priest of Lutterbach in Alsatia, in defence of Gregory⁷. ^d King, he says, is not a name of nature but a title of office: nor does the people exalt him so high above it in order to give him the free power of playing the tyrant in its midst, but to defend him from tyranny. So soon as he begins to act the tyrant, is it not plain that he falls from the dignity granted to him? since it is evident that he has first broken that contract by virtue of which he was appointed. If one should engage a man for a fair wage to tend swine (the simile is not flattering), and he find means not to tend but to steal them, would one not remove him from his charge? It is impossible to express the theory of 'social contract' more clearly than Manegold does: ^e since, he says, no one can create himself emperor or king, the people elevates a certain one person over itself to this end that he govern and rule it according to the principle of righteous government; but if in any wise he transgresses the contract by virtue of which he is chosen, he absolves the people from the obligation of submission, because he has first broken faith with it. But the writer was in fact going far beyond what his party required: for certainly nothing could have been more distasteful to Gregory the Seventh and his followers than to give subjects a general right of deposing their sovereigns. All that the pope maintained

^d Cap. xxx.
ap. Floto 2.
289 n.

^e Cap. xlvii.,
ibid.

⁷ It is preserved in a single manuscript, and has not, so far as I am aware, been printed. Extracts are given by Floto: see his account of the work, vol. 2. 299-303.

was that they should be ready to rise in arms against them at the bidding of the head of the church. Individual or popular liberty was the last thing Gregory wished to establish; absolute obedience was as much a part of his theory as it was of the imperialists: the only question was to whom, as the supreme lord, it was due. CHAP. VIII.

It was not however until a considerably later date that the upholders of the independence of the civil state ventured to frame a counter-theory for their action. For the present ¹they were content to rely on the established usage of the Latin church and on the ²formal recognition by Nicholas the Second of the emperor's right to ratify the election of the pope³. If they be held to have had the better of the argument, they limited themselves to the temporary demands of controversy. The first attempt to look apart from surrounding conditions and to produce a coherent system which should aspire to the character of a philosophy of politics came from the other side. When John of Salisbury applied himself to this subject in three books of his Polycraticus there is nothing to remind us that the contest between Frederick Barbarossa and Hadrian the Fourth was just then ripening to a declaration of hostilities, or that the author himself was alienated from royal favour on account of his attachment to the policy of saint Thomas Becket. His treatment bears no reference to contemporary forms of government. His examples are those of the Old Testament or of the ancient Roman empire; there is not a trace even of the terminology of feudalism. John may now and then allude incidentally to modern

¹ It does not fall within my plan to go through the controversial literature of this time. A bibliography will be found in Giesebrecht, Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit, 3. 1049, 1104; 1865.

² Cf. Floto 2. 294-298.
³ Pertz, legg. 2 app. p. 178; 1837.

CHAP. VIII. customs,^h but it is only by way of illustration^g. The terms he employs for the officers of government and for the military organization are all foreign to feudal times and almost entirely classical. ¹His authorities for military affairs are Frontinus, Vegetius, and the rest; his general scheme of the state is drawn from the Institutio Traiani ascribed to Plutarch. There is no sign in it even of an order of nobility. All temporary matters John passes by, in order to attain what appear to him to be the eternal principles of civil right. Like the hierarchical doctrine which he expounds, his theory is entirely ideal, and bears almost an ironical complexion if we think of applying it to any monarchy of his own or indeed of any time.

^h Lib. iv. 2
p. 270.

¹ Cap. 1 p.
208.

^m Cap. 2 pp.
270 sq.; cf.
Ulpian., ap.
pandect. iur.
civ., dig. i.
tit. iii. 31,
vol. 1. 80 B, ed. Antwerp
1575 folio.

^k John starts from the notion of equity as *the perfect adjustment of things,—convenientia rerum,—*of which there are on earth two interpreters, the law and the civil ruler. Having by a ¹previous definition excluded all bad kings, under the common name of 'tyrants,' from the field of his discussion, he is the more free to elevate the ideal grandeur of kingship. ^mWhen, he says, we speak of the prince as released from the bands of the law, it is not that he has license to do wrong, but forasmuch as he ought to be moved not by fear of punishment but by the love of justice to observe equity, to further the advantage of the commonwealth, and in all things to choose the good of others before his private will. But who would speak of the prince's will in public matters? whereas he has no leave to will aught therein, save that which is counselled by law or equity, or determined by the consideration of the general use. In such concerns his will

^g Compare his reference to the corruption practised by sheriffs and by 'iustitiis quae, ut vulgari nostro utar, recte dicuntur errantes,' Poli-

crat. v. 16 p. 315. Other notices of recent history are very interesting; see book vi. 6 pp. 344 sqq., 18 pp. 370 sqq., &c.

ought to possess the validity of judgement, and most rightly in them, according to the maxim of jurists, ^a his pleasure hath the force of law; because his sentence differs not from the mind of equity. ^o Without this understood condition the maxim is false. The king therefore is so far independent of the law that his rank is coördinate with it: he stands on an equal level as an exponent of eternal right. Thus he can be described as ^p an image of the divine majesty on earth . . . All power is of the lord God; . . . the power of the prince is therefore in such wise of God that it is still his, though it be exercised through the hand of a deputy.

CHAP. VIII.

^a Ulp., ibid., tit. iv. 1 p. 84 c.^o Polier. iv. 7 pp. 230 sq.^p Cap. 1 pp. 208 sq.

We might think John of Salisbury to be the most fervent of imperialists; yet in fact his exaltation of the nobility of kingship is but a means towards the erection of a higher dignity still for the spiritual power. For the king's authority is only mediately derived from God. ^q The sword, the symbol of worldly power, the prince receives from the hand of the church. He is therefore the servant of the priesthood, merely exercising in its stead functions which it is too sacred to perform itself.

^q Cap. 3 p. 212.

^r Vain, says John, is the authority of all laws except it bear the image of the divine law; and useless is the decree of a prince unless it be conformable to the discipline of the church.

^r Cap. 6 p. 223.

Yet here too the theory is purely ideal, John's conception of a state is that it depends upon the absolute principles of righteousness, and it was inevitable in his surroundings that he should identify these principles with the actual church of Christ, which stood as the symbol of them. No man was more outspoken in exposing the vices and abuses with which it was attended.

^s This unsparing denunciation was indeed usual with the heartiest upholders of church rights in the middle ages;

^s Cf. Friedberg 1. 5 sq.

CHAP. VIII. and it tells strongly for their honesty and candour. But still there was no other institution in existence to which one could point as in origin dependent, and dependent solely, on principles higher than the common worldly rules of conduct. Accordingly John devotes the major part of his description to a [†]commentary on that passage expounding the duties of kingship which forms so remarkable a feature in the book of Deuteronomy. Thus far John's theory is just the conventional one which had been handed down through generations of churchmen. In principle it shows hardly any advance or development from that simple little manual which Jonas, bishop of Orleans, had compiled more than three centuries earlier for the instruction of Pippin, king of Aquitaine¹⁰. Jonas indeed is less ambitious and contents himself for the most part with stringing together extracts from the Bible and the fathers; but John of Salisbury's classical erudition did not lead him at all to modify the main point, of the supremacy of the church over the world. Both alike [‡]find their best examples in Deuteronomy¹¹.

[†] Polier. iv. 4-12 pp. 217-249; Deut. xvii. 14-20.

[‡] Jon 15, cap. 3 p. 328 a.

The Bible however furnishes but scanty materials for distributing more minutely the mutual relation of the several elements of the state, and John has recourse to a late Roman treatise, the Institutio Traiani already referred to, from which he draws the following simile.

[‡] Polier. v. 2 pp. 251 sq. ^x The state, he says, has been likened to a living

¹⁰ The treatise to which dom d'Achery prefixed the title De institutione regia (Spicilegium i. 323, ed. 1723) is a sort of special supplement to the bishop's three books De institutione laicali, his 'Holy Living,' we may say, printed ibid., pp. 258-323. I do not assert John of Salisbury's indebtedness to the book, for there is no evidence of the degree of popularity it enjoyed during the middle ages. The editors of it only mention two manuscripts, one at Rome, the other at Orleans, p. 324.

¹¹ I cannot therefore agree with Dr Sigmund Riezler, Die literarischen Widersacher der Päpste zur Zeit Ludwig des Baiers 136, 1874, that the use of the Old Testament forms a peculiar characteristic of the Polieraticus.

organism of which the soul is represented by religion, CHAP. VIII.
 the head by the prince, and the other members by the various efficient classes of society. The hands are the soldiery, the feet the husbandmen and working people;
 the belly is the administration of finance, always inclined to surfeit and bring disorder upon the rest of the body; and the heart is the senate. John does not here enforce the principle, upon which indeed he has previously laid sufficient stress, of the subordination of the temporal state to the spiritual. He portrays religion as the 'soul' of government for the obvious reason that its care is for the interests of the soul; and if he recurs to the high estimation in which the priesthood ought to be held, it is simply as a corollary from the reverence due to things in which they minister. There is no question here of the political duties of the church¹².
 It does not therefore concern us to linger over the long didactic exposition which John writes upon the supposed text of Plutarch, and of which our only complaint is that it takes no account, except by way of illustration, of any of the facts and conditions of medieval polity. The classical ground-work gives a sort of individuality to John's treatment. He writes like an inferior Roman moralist of the silver age; but few would trouble themselves with his delineation were ¹² I make this remark in order to guard against an inference which may naturally be drawn from Dr Schaarschmidt's statement, p. 163, —also Dr Riezler's, l. c.,—that John explains the soul of the state as 'the priesthood.' John in fact uses the most general terms: 'Ea vero quæ cultum religionis in nobis instituunt et informant et . . . dei ceremonias tradunt, vicem animæ in corpore rei publicæ obtinent.

Illos vero,' it is true he adds, 'qui religionis cultui præsent, quasi animam corporis suspicere et venerari oportet. Quis enim sanctitatis ministros dei ipsius vicarios esse ambigit?' Lib. v. 2 p. 251. But the reference to old Roman usages which immediately follows is sufficient to persuade us that he is speaking only of the priest as supreme in his own, that is, in the spiritual, field.

CHAP. VIII. it not for the incidental allusions to, and observations respecting, contemporary or recent history.

There is one particular in which John's system is distinguished from almost every other political writer of the middle ages. It has already been noticed that John guards his theory of kingship by a careful distinction so as to exclude tyrants from all its privileges. Though he does not commit himself to the 'contract' notion which we have found in Manegold, it is clear that the ethical proviso which John requires, amounts in practice to the same thing and allows a large enough field for the exercise of popular opinion. But John extends the application of this check on misrule in a remarkable way. He inculcates with peculiar energy the duty not only of deposing but of slaying tyrants.

* Lib. viii.
20 p. 648.

* He wrote a book, now lost, On the End of Tyrants, devoted as it seems to this special subject, to which he

* Libb. iv. 15
pp. 207 sq., viii. 17-20
pp. 623-653.

* more than once recurs in the Policraticus. Tyrannicide is not only lawful, it is obligatory; we may resort to any means to effect this object except poison,^b which is

* Lib. viii. 20
p. 653.

* Cap. 19
p. 647.

not justified by example and is^c abhorrent from English customs. With this single exception any act overt or covert is allowable against the tyrant.^d He is an enemy of the state and therefore those moral restrictions which bind society have no force in our dealings with him. We may flatter him, or employ any art, in order to lure him on to his destruction¹³.

* Libb. iv.
15 pp. 207 sq.;
viii. 18 p. 640.

It needs not be pointed out how accurately John had learned the historical lessons of the Old Testament. All ¹³ It is a most curious coincidence that another Johannes Parvus, Jean Petit, made this doctrine conspicuous in relation to the murder of the duke of Orleans in 1407. His arguments are identical: see M.

Creighton, History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation i. 372-376; 1882. The position was condemned in a general way by the council of Constance, 1415-1416.

through the controversial literature relating to church and state, the hierarchical party, 'as we have said, like the English puritans of a later age, rely on the precedents furnished by Hebrew history¹⁴, and pass by, or explain spiritually, those passages of the Christian Scriptures which insist with such emphasis on the universal duty of obedience to the temporal ruler. The doctrine that 'the powers that be are ordained of God' was held only with the reservation that God acted through the instrumentality of the church. Christianity in fact hardly influenced their political doctrine, except in so far as it considered life on earth as merely the preparation for another life hereafter, the 'road,' via, according to the expressive and constantly recurring phrase, that leads to the eternal 'home,' patria. Hence a new goal was set to human aspirations, and the nature of the civil state lost in worth by comparison of the supreme interests which lay beyond its cognisance. Nor did John of Salisbury at all readjust or discriminate the various factors in this mixed tradition of Hebrew and Christian ideas. He enriched it by proofs and lessons from classical history, but the stuff of his system remained the same as that current in the common speech of churchmen. It needed another classical influence to be brought to bear upon politics to raise them from a medley of empirical axioms to something approaching the character of a philosophical theory. This influence was found in the thirteenth century in the Politics of Aristotle: its first exponent is the

CHAP. VIII.
 * Cf. supra,
 pp. 231 sq.

Rom. xiii. 1.

¹⁴ Thomas Aquinas, whose writings indeed stand apart from controversy, curiously inverts this position. In the Old Testament, he says, where men looked only for temporary promises, the priests were subject to the king; but the New elevates the priesthood higher because in it men are directed to eternal goods: De regimine principum i. 14 Opp. 17. 166, ed. Venice 1593 folio; with the volumes and folios of which the edition of Antwerp 1612 agrees.

CHAP. VIII. greatest and profoundest teacher of the middle ages, saint Thomas Aquinas.

The *Rule of Princes*¹⁵ to which Aquinas devoted a special treatise, appears to him by no means a necessary form of government. Under the guidance of Aristotle, he approaches the subject with an entire absence of prejudice for it or any other form. ^sThe supreme power, he says, may be confided to many, to few, or to one; and each of these arrangements may be good or bad. ^aHe raises a presumption on quite general grounds that the unity of society—and this is the main object of government—is best secured by its subjection to a single ruler; but an aristocracy or a government by the people itself he allows to be equally legitimate, though not so well adapted to the necessities of the state. It is not the form but the character of the constitution that makes it good or bad. ⁱAs monarchy is the most perfect form, so on the other hand its opposite, tyranny, is the most corrupt and abominable. Aquinas distinguishes, as minutely as John of Salisbury, between the king and the tyrant; like John, he postulates for the former an absolute devotion to the duties of his office, and thus exalts him to so ideal a dignity that he is empowered to speak of him as ^kholding the same position in his own domain as God holds over the universe; he stands to his ⁱ De regim. princ. i. 3 ff. 161, &c.

^s De regim. princ. i. 1, 2 opp. 17. 161; cf. Baumann 121.

^a Cf. summ. contra gent. iv. 76 opp. 9. 513.

^k Cap. 12 f. 165.

¹⁵ The four books De regimine principum which held their ground as the accepted textbook of political philosophy until the opening of modern history, are only in part the work of saint Thomas. His treatise is a fragment which breaks off in the course of the second book, and the remainder is the production in all probability of his disciple Ptolemy of Lucca. With the help however of some others of Thomas's writings, and in particular of his commentary on Aristotle's Politics, we are enabled to fill up the most important gaps in his treatment of the subject and to gain a nearly complete view of his political theory. On the authorship of the De regimine principum see Riezler 137 and J. J. Baumann's Staatslehre des h. Thomas von Aquino 5 sq.; 1873. The latter work contains an extremely serviceable collection (in German) of the passages in Thomas's works, bearing upon the subject of polity.

realm (this is more than John would have allowed) as CHAP. VIII. the soul to the body.

But to this supremacy there are two limitations. In the first place while the end of all government is so to order human affairs that men may be the best prepared for eternal happiness, the special responsibility for spiritual concerns resides in the priests, who thus stand in the position of overlords to the civil ruler. The spiritual destiny of man requires a divine law over and above natural or human law. ¹*In order, therefore, that the spiritual be kept separate from the earthly, the office of this kingdom is committed not to earthly kings but to the priests, and above all to the chief priest, the successor of Peter, the vicegerent of Christ, the Roman bishop, to whom is due the subjection of all kings of the Christian people, even as to the lord Jesus Christ himself.* In the treatise Of the Rule of Princes, which he left a fragment, Aquinas hardly pursues the subject further; but elsewhere he propounds with the utmost decision the hierarchical theory of the church. ^mIt is necessary, he says, to have some supreme authority in matters of faith: this authority resides in the pope, in whom is realised the unity of the church and the presence of the divine government. To him therefore is entrusted the power to control and to revise the ordinances of religion; ⁿhe has even competence to promulgate a new confession of faith in order to prevent the rise of erroneous beliefs. Those who have any acquaintance with medieval history know how elastic a term 'error' was in the mouth of the pope, and ^oThomas pronounces that from the moment of the issue of an authoritative excommunication against a sovereign, he is deprived of the right to rule and his subjects are released from their oath of allegiance. It is of course a statement of the accepted doctrine among the

¹ Lib. i. 14 f. 166.

^m Summ. contra gent. iv. 76 opp. 9-512 sq.

ⁿ 2 second. i. 10 opp. 11 (2) 7 sq.

^o Ibid., qu. xii. 2 f. 34.

CHAP. VIII. hierarchical party, and need not be further discussed ; especially since Aquinas places by its side another check upon misrule the more interesting because of its approximation to modern ways of thought.

This second limitation upon royal power is that of the popular will. But let it be understood from the outset that the philosopher has no dream of looking to the capricious action of individual patriots as the instrument for setting things right ; such is not his idea of maintaining order. ^pTyrannicide in the common sense he altogether repudiates. It is more seemly, he says, to proceed to the overthrow of tyrants not according to the personal presumption of one, but on public authority. [If the community has the right of electing its prince, it has also the right of deposing him ; no oath of fealty, even though sworn in perpetuity, can stand in its way. If the prince be himself subject to a superior power, let the people invoke his aid ; but if there be no earthly authority to appeal to, they can only trust to God and to patience.

^p De regim.
princ. i. 6
f. 163.

^q Cf. Baumann 141.

^r 1 Pet. ii. 18.

^s Baumann
125 sqq.

^t De regim.
princ. i. 6
f. 162.

^q Aquinas therefore allows no redress for misgovernment unless the redress sought be in conformity with law ; he tempers the freedom of Old Testament examples by the rule of the New, ^r*Be subject to your masters with all fear ; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.* Yet he is so little satisfied with this conclusion that, while he ^sallows the advantage of hereditary monarchy in special circumstances, he strongly commends the elective form as a general rule, evidently because each new election gives an opportunity for placing restraints upon the royal power. Besides, as has appeared, an elected sovereign is legally subvertible. But Aquinas has no scheme to propound as to how the royal power is to be limited : ^twe are indeed told to contrive such a method of government as to leave the ruler no opportunity for violent measures; but our philosopher gives no hint about the best means of arranging this, and insists mainly on the necessity for the community to choose their ruler wisely at the outset. ^a The prince, too, he explains, will find it to his own interest to moderate his actions in obedience to the popular will; otherwise he runs a risk of exciting his subjects to rebellion. His own prudence is thus the principal check on his conduct. CHAP. VIII.

—
^a Baumann
138.

^a Aquinas however only allows the title of king, in the strict sense of the word, to those who hold an absolute government, not in deference to the laws but according to virtue. It is John of Salisbury's notion in another shape. ^v He placed the king in a position external to law, because his acts were to be guided by the principles of eternal right; Aquinas substitutes the word 'virtue,' but the idea is the same: neither discusses the possibility of the two forces, of the law and the royal authority, coming into collision; or more accurately, they have already provided for the contingency by a definition of kingship which such conflict ipso facto changes into tyranny. ^a The king, in Aquinas' view, has to supplement the deficiencies of law by following the rule, or unwritten law, of his own will and his own reason. In opposition to this kingship which may be broadly distinguished in modern phrase as the theoretical imperial conception, ^a Thomas places the improper, what he terms the Lacedemonian, order. Such a king, he says, is bound to reign according to the laws and therefore is not lord over all. On the other hand ^b the less absolute he is, the more likely is his government to last, because there is the less chance of his stirring up illwill among his subjects. Yet even here we have to qualify the statement according to special ^v V. supra,
pp. 234 sq., 238.

^a Baumann
134 sq.

^a Expos. in Arist. polit.
iii. lect. viii.
opp. 5 (2) 52.

^b Baumann
138.

CHAP. VIII. circumstances. For instance, 'in an advanced state of general civilisation, there is always a certain number of citizens possessing the governing spirit, who may therefore be expected to dispute the prince's authority, however much it be limited by prescription; whereas in a ruder state of society an absolute monarch has the better expectation of the permanent enjoyment of power, because there, the moral standard being in the average so low, it is easier for one man to stand out among his fellows with the special qualifications of kingship.

* Expos. in
pol. iii. lect.
xvi. f. 57.

If Aquinas is evidently embarrassed in his attempt to combine the free politics which he read in the Greek examples with the existing specimens of monarchy in his own time, a difficulty which comes out curiously when he finds himself compelled to restrict citizenship to the soldiery and officers of government, he makes amends by the clear and philosophic conception he forms of the nature of the state and of the sovereign's ideal relation to it. He rejects the popular 'spiritual' view which from Gregory the Seventh to Wycliffe regarded civil association as a consequence of the fall of man¹⁶.

* Baumann
147, 154.

* 1 summ.
theol. xcvi.
4 opp. 10. 317.

* De regim.
princ. i. 1
f. 161.

Without the fall, he says, there would have been no slavery; but man's social instincts are an essential part of his constitution. 'He cannot live alone as the beasts, nor is he like them provided with, or capable of supplying, the necessaries of life. He subsists by association and coöperation, and out of this need arises the necessity for a state, to unite and control individual action. The unity of society expressed in the formation of the state is given effect to in the person of the ruler. Following

¹⁶ In the Secunda secundae x. 10 fol. 30, he says 'Dominium vel praelatio introducta est [ed. sunt] ex iure humano: distinctio autem

fiedlium et infidelium est ex iure divino. Ius autem divinum quod est ex gratia, non tollit ius humanum quod est ex naturali ratione.'

out this idea of the state as an organized unity, representing humanity in all its properties and therefore having ^anot only an economical but also a moral aim, ^aBaumann 108. Aquinas is able to arrive at some political results which are remarkably accordant with modern theories. Foremost among these is ^bhis distinct preference for nationality, involving community of manners and customs¹⁷, as the basis of a state, a principle which helps him to the conclusion that ^csmall states are a priori better than large ones. Nor can we omit to note the emphasis with which Thomas maintains that ^dit is the duty of the state to provide for the education of all its members and ^eto see that no citizen suffers want. These points we only advert to in order to show that in them, just as in the optional or variable character assigned to the ultimate form of government, a churchman like Thomas Aquinas approaches nearer to the opinions of modern times than the generality of those who defended the claims of the emperor as against the pope, by a theory of the necessary, the indefeasible, the divine, basis of the imperial dignity¹⁸.

With this idea Thomas had of necessity no concern. The empire might be held to have expired with Frederick the Second; and if Thomas wrote his book Of the Rule of Princes before the year 1266, it was at a time when the title of king of the Romans was disputed by two mann, pp. 93 sqq. and the whole section, pp. 190-203) and repudiates the very thought of religious toleration: 2 Secund. x. 11, 12, xi. Opp. 11(2) 30 sqq., xxxix. 4 f. 101 (Baumann 185-189). Yet in both these particulars he shows a good deal of insight and sound sense. See for example the objections he raises against the forcible baptism of the children of unbelievers, Qu. x. 12 f. 31 (Baumann 185 sq.).

¹⁷ Neither in Aquinas nor in John of Paris, whose views on this point agree with his (see his treatise De potestate regia et papali iii, M. Goldast, Monarchia s. Romani Imperii 2. III, Frankfurt 1614 folio), do I find any notice of the advantage of a common language.

¹⁸ It is of course needless to say that Aquinas has the most rudimentary notions of political economy (see the passages given by Dr Bau-

CHAP. VIII.

^a Baumann 108.

^b Ibid., pp. 144 sq.

^c Ibid., p. 152.

^d Ibid., pp. 161 sqq.

^e Ibid., pp. 155 sq.

CHAP. VIII. candidates neither of whom possessed, one of whom hardly aspired to, the shadow of real power. No emperor was again crowned until thirty years after Aquinas' death; and he was naturally led to the inference that the empire was absorbed into, or reunited with, the mother-church: it has not ceased, he said, *but is changed from the temporal to the spiritual*¹⁹. It is indeed evident that his view of the unique position of the church was one that could admit no rival to her in the secular state. But on the other hand the express preference which Thomas displays for nationality as the basis of the state, shows that he had learned, what the civilians remained ignorant of, that the world had outgrown the imperial conception; which notwithstanding still survived, always less and less of a reality, for upwards of five hundred years. Aquinas wrote in fact on the eve of a revolution in the history of European politics, not the less momentous because its results were defined in no external changes of government, dynasty, or frontier, were almost impalpable to contemporaries, and left all parties for the time as clamorous, as assertive, as before.

This change may be regarded in three sections. First, the opposition between the church and the empire bea fide catholica Romanæ ecclesiæ.' Expos. in 2 ad Thess. ii. opp. 16. 172 E. Cf. J. Bryce, The holy Roman Empire 114 n. 2. A curious gloss was given at an earlier time, during the contest concerning investitures, by Bonizo bishop of Sutri, namely, that the empire spoken of in the prophecy was the eastern; the western had already long been annihilated in consequence of the vices of its rulers. See Doellinger, Das Kaiserthum Karls des Grossen und seiner Nachfolger, in the Münchner historische Jahrbuch für 1865 pp. 387 sqq.

¹⁹ The coming of Antichrist, it was believed, would be heralded by a discessio, a departure from the faith and a secession from the Roman empire of part of its subjects. 'Sed quomodo est hoc?' asks saint Thomas; 'quia iamdiu gentes recesserunt a Romano imperio, et tamen necdum venit Antichristus. Dicendum est quod nondum cessavit, sed est commutatum de temporali in spirituale, ut dicit Leo papa in sermone de Apostolis: et ideo dicendum est quod discessio a Romano imperio debet intelligi non solum a temporali sed a spirituali, id est

came broadened into a general opposition between the church and the civil government of each individual kingdom. The consolidation of the French and English monarchies had raised up two forces with which it was far harder for the pope to grapple, than it had been, at all events in recent times, in the case of the empire. For apart from the fact that these powers were growing, while the German was declining, in solidity and in national feeling, they had had no tradition which made them coördinate with the apostolic see, and which therefore might appear as a standing menace to the latter; they were in one sense beneath its dignity, and therefore all the freer to expand at their own will and to defy the intrusion of papal claims. The assertion of a national consciousness found imitators, and in Rome itself there were fitful and abortive endeavours (those of Arnold of Brescia in the twelfth, and of Rienzi in the fourteenth, century are notorious) to dissociate the city from the curia and to justify the lineage of the people by an idle claim to elect or to supersede the emperor. In the second place, when the empire did revive, it was but a shadow of its old self. The title of emperor, or of king of the Romans (for the higher style was by no means regularly added), became insensibly a mere ornamental adjunct to a principality which had only a real existence, let us say, in Bavaria, in Austria, or in Bohemia: at best its holder was but a German sovereign, and each attempt to achieve the higher distinction of the empire, and to supplement the crown of Aix by those of Milan and Arles and Rome, ended in increasingly disastrous failure. It was exactly this period of decline that produced a literature in which the imperial idea was developed and glorified to a splendour unthought of hitherto. No less

CHAP. VIII.

CHAP. VIII. exaggerated are the claims now put forward for its rival.

^m Gerhoh.
Reichersp.
ep. ad Henr.
card., i. ii.
Migne 194.
9 sq.

For in the third place, while the vitality of the empire was diminishing, the church was making rapid steps towards occupying the prerogatives left unclaimed or unrealised by it. As early as the middle of the twelfth century an anxious observer had remarked ^mthat men spoke more of the Roman curia than of the Roman church. It was becoming a state among states while it aspired to be the supreme state that commanded and united all inferiors. Innocent the Third had made in his person the 'vicegerent of Peter' into the 'vicegerent of Christ;' and with Innocent the papacy reached its zenith. Nor did it for a long time exhibit any symptoms of decline. The conqueror of the empire fell beneath the defiance of the French king Philip the Fair, or more truly beneath the irresistible opposition of a strong national spirit in the kingdoms of Europe. The universal authority of Rome became confined within the narrow territory of Avignon: the means by which it was exerted became more and more secular, diplomatic, mercantile; and its spiritual efficiency was so far impaired that the loyallest servants of the catholic church could stand forth as the stoutest champions against the policy of the papacy, just because that policy was seen to be the surest means towards the destruction of the church.

It is not a little remarkable that the secret of the reformation, namely, the incompatibility of the claims of the church with the rights of the different nations that formed it, should have been so early discovered. But it was inevitable that, once the discovery was made, once the standard was raised against the encroachments (for so they were bitterly felt) of the papacy, the crusade should be extended to the abuses or deficiencies which were too obvious within the constitutional or dogmatic fabric of the church itself; and the heresies of Wycliffe or Hus were a natural outcome of the resistance provoked by Boniface the Eighth or John the Twenty-Second. It is not our purpose to follow the history to these issues: it is only necessary to observe that they were involved essentially in the conflict caused by the widened claims of the church. The political results of this conflict will come before us in the following chapter, but to make its precise conditions clear we have preliminarily to educe from the writings of the papal party the precise figure which the conception of the church took in their minds.

The time when Gregory the Ninth consolidated the canon law, that fertile source of fabulous ideas of history, is well known to coincide with a general failure of historical insight and historical veracity, which operated well-nigh as strongly upon the actors in the events of this period as upon its chroniclers. Fictions were everywhere accepted as truth and used recklessly to explain existing facts; and among these fictions two had a diffusion and influence which it is difficult to overestimate. One of these, the Donation, by virtue of which Constantine was alleged to have abdicated his imperial authority in Italy (^ait was afterwards said, in all parts of the west²⁰) in favour of the successor of saint Peter, had been used [°]as early as the middle of the eleventh century as a

^a Doellinger, papst-fabeln pp. 73, 83; Friedberg i. 8.
[°] Doellinger 77.

²⁰ Thus Augustin Trionfo: Ad papam pertinet immediate imperii plena iurisdictio. Postquam enim Constantinus cessit imperio occidentali, nulla sibi reservatione facta, in civitate Romana, in partibus Italiae, et in omnibus occidentalibus regionibus, plenum ius totius imperii est acquisitum summis pontificibus, non solum superioris dominationis, verum etiam immediatae adminis-

trationis, ut ex ipsis tota dependeat imperialis iurisdictio, quantum ad electionem et quantum ad confirmationem: ita ut extunc nullus de iure potuerit se intromittere de regimine occidentalis imperii absque expressa auctoritate et mandato sedis apostolicae, nisi usurpative et tyrannice: De potest. eccl. xxxviii. 1 p. 224.

CHAP. VIII. weapon against the German claim²¹. But by this time it had been discovered to prove too much, and Innocent the Fourth had to explain that the terms of this notable document were inaccurate: Constantine could not have granted to the papacy that which it possessed by the irrefragable gift of Christ; he could only have restored that which had been violently usurped from its legitimate owner²². Such was the view which found special favour among the churchmen of the fourteenth century, like Augustin Trionfo and Alvaro Pelayo²³. Still whether it were a donation or an act of restitution, few (if any) questioned the reality of the fact or suspected the impudence of the fraud; and it exercised as much the wits of jurists and of those who were opposed to the temporal aggrandisement of the church, as it did of the defenders of that power.

The second fiction to which we have referred is that of the Translation of the Empire, which, though ^ppreviously suggested by one or two controversialists, was not put into an authentic form ^quntil the famous decree, ^r*Venerabilem*, of Innocent the Third. It gained a sudden and lasting publicity from the moment that it was included in Gregory the Ninth's collection of Decretals, and henceforward it was the shield behind which the popes fought;

^p Doellinger, kaiserth. Karls des Grossen 391.
^q Ibid., pp. 397 sq.
^r Decret. Greg. ix. i. 6 cap. 34, P. Lancelot. corp. iur. canon. 480, ed. Paris 1618 folio.

²¹ The document unquestionably is as old as the years 752-774; see Doellinger, Papst-Fabeln pp. 67 sqq., 72-76; and compare Bryce, pp. 42 sq.

²² Non solum pontificalem sed regalem [Christus] constituit principatum beato Petro eiusque successoribus, terreni simul ac coelestis imperii commissis habenis, quod in pluralitate clavium competenter inuitur: manuscript ap. F. von Raumer, Geschichte der Hohenstaufen 4. 120 n., ed. 2, 1841.

²³ Si inveniatur quandoque aliquos imperatores dedisse aliqua temporalia summis pontificibus, sicut Constantinus dedit Silvestro, hoc non est intelligendum eos dare quod suum est, sed restituere quod iniuste et tyrannice ablatum est: Aug. Trionfo, i. 1 p. 3; cf. qu. xxxvii. 1-5 pp. 219-223. See also Alvaro Pelayo, De planctu ecclesiae i. 43, Ulm 1474 folio; and on the other side, John of Paris, De potest. reg. et pap. xvi. Goldast 2. 130.

it entered into all polemics and all history-books down to and beyond the close of the middle ages. The problem was to explain how it came about that Charles the Great obtained the imperial crown; how, in other words, the empire was transferred from the Greeks to the Franks. That this Translation was a reality no one thought of doubting. *The empire of Charles was no mere resuscitation of the extinct empire of the west; it was the continuation of that universal empire, whose seat Constantine had established at Byzantium, but whose existence there was now held to have terminated by the succession of a woman, the empress Irene: the throne of her predecessor, Constantine the Sixth, remained unoccupied. The empire therefore went back to its rightful seat, and its title devolved upon Charles. His Lombard kingdom, added to the greatness of his Frankish domain, qualified him, without a competitor, for a supremacy to which he was called by the will of the Roman people, expressed through their spokesman, pope Leo the Third. Such was the conception admitted without dispute for centuries after the decisive event of the middle ages had taken place. †The only differences in its statement concern the relative shares of the emperor, the pope, and the Roman people in the transaction. It was well understood to be a sudden prompting of divine inspiration, the vehicle of which was necessarily the pope; but all accounts alike recognise the confirmation of the Roman people, and ‡the Frankish records leave no doubt that the pope completed the ceremony of coronation by 'adoring' the emperor; thus recognising the sanctity of his person in a manner which is highly significant when we remember the ideas held of the relative positions of pope and emperor in later ages.

CHAP. VIII.

* Doellinger
351 sq.; cf.
Bryce 47, 62
sq.

† Cf. Bryce
53-57.

‡ Cf. Doel-
linger 364 sq.

CHAP. VIII. It is plain that any view which did not attribute the whole validity of the Translation to the official act of Leo the Third could not find favour with the new school of ecclesiastical politicians²⁴. In the contest concerning investitures the difficulty of the common notion was already perceived. ² Bonizo bishop of Sutri cut the knot by denying that the empire had ever passed into the hands of the Franks; it pertained still to the inheritance of the Greeks: the German claim was merely fictitious. Still its existence under the Franconian or the Suabian emperors was too pressing a reality to be explained away; and the extreme view taken by imperialists, that Charles's elevation was simply obtained by right of conquest²⁵, was naturally enough balanced by an equal exaggeration on the other side, which saw in the event of the year 800, nothing less than a supreme example of the power inherent in the successor of saint Peter to displace and create empires. In such fashion it came about that Innocent the Third was able to state this audacious falsification of history as a cardinal fact in the relations of the church to the world. No discovery could have been more momentous. What the pope had given he could take away. ³ By the death of the emperor the jurisdiction of the empire reverted into the hands of the pope; and it lay in his power to decide when the vacancy should be terminated. If there was a double election it was for him to say which was the ² Supra, p. 246 n. 19.

³ Cf. Riezler 7 sq., 17 sq.

²⁴ It was common to seek the inception of the scheme in the policy of Hadrian the First (see Alvaro Pelayo i. 41) or even to throw it as far back as the time of Stephen the Second. The latter viewed its popularity to Bernard of Parma's gloss on the Decretals (see Doellinger, Kaiserthum Karls des Grossen 398) and was accepted by Martinus Polonus, Richard of Poitiers, and a crowd of later chroniclers (ib. pp. 400-412).

²⁵ Compare Frederick the First's famous Roman oration reported by Otto of Freising, De gest. Frid. ii. 21 Pertz 20. 405.

out this idea of the state as an organized unity, representing humanity in all its properties and therefore having ^anot only an economical but also a moral aim, ^bAquinas is able to arrive at some political results which are remarkably accordant with modern theories. Foremost among these is ^bhis distinct preference for nationality, involving community of manners and customs¹⁷, as the basis of a state, a principle which helps him to the conclusion that ^csmall states are a priori better than large ones. Nor can we omit to note the emphasis with which Thomas maintains that ^dit is the duty of the state to provide for the education of all its members and ^eto see that no citizen suffers want. These points we only advert to in order to show that in them, just as in the optional or variable character assigned to the ultimate form of government, a churchman like Thomas Aquinas approaches nearer to the opinions of modern times than the generality of those who defended the claims of the emperor as against the pope, by a theory of the necessary, the indefeasible, the divine, basis of the imperial dignity¹⁸.

With this idea Thomas had of necessity no concern. The empire might be held to have expired with Frederick the Second; and if Thomas wrote his book Of the Rule of Princes before the year 1266, it was at a time when the title of king of the Romans was disputed by two mann, pp. 93 sqq. and the whole section, pp. 190-203) and repudiates the very thought of religious toleration: 2 Secund. x. 11, 12, xi. Opp. 11(2) 30 sqq., xxxix. 4 f. 101 (Baumann 185-189). Yet in both these particulars he shows a good deal of insight and sound sense. See for example the objections he raises against the forcible baptism of the children of unbelievers, Qu. x. 12 f. 31 (Baumann 185 sq.).

¹⁷ Neither in Aquinas nor in John of Paris, whose views on this point agree with his (see his treatise De potestate regia et papali iii, M. Goldast, Monarchia s. Romani Imperii 2. III, Frankfurt 1614 folio), do I find any notice of the advantage of a common language.

¹⁸ It is of course needless to say that Aquinas has the most rudimentary notions of political economy (see the passages given by Dr Bau-

CHAP. VIII.

^a Baumann 108.

^b Ibid., pp. 144 sq.

^c Ibid., p. 152.

^d Ibid., pp. 161 sqq.

^e Ibid., pp. 155 sq.

CHAP. VIII. his election; nor can any one depose him. ^eA general council may indeed declare his deposition in the event of his falling into heresy; but then it is not the sentence of the council that is operative against him, but ^fthe act of heresy, by virtue of which he ceases ipso facto to be pope. Except in this single instance he calls for universal and unquestioning obedience. ^gFrom his will there is no appeal, not even to the judgement of God; for the utterance of the pope is identical with God's. ^hAn appeal to God is therefore worse than futile; it convicts the appellant of rebellion against the divine government of the universe.

Being thus raised high above all earthly conditions, it is evident that the authority of the papacy altogether transcends that of the empire. The pope, says Trionfo, has the right not only of ⁱdeposing the emperor but also of ^kchoosing one of his own discretion, supposing that there is a want of unanimity or other defect in the election, that the object of his choice is marked out by preëminent merit, or that the head of the church is able by this exercise of his prerogative to secure her peace or the overthrow of her spiritual enemies. ^lHe may thus in case of necessity deprive the established electors of their privilege and transfer it to whom he will, he may change the constitution of the empire; just as indeed he may transfer or change any other temporal government, being the representative on earth of the supreme Arbiter of kingdoms. ^mThe existence of the civil state is only justified by the presiding presence of the priesthood, and ⁿthis authorisation obtains in the west by that Donation which restored its entire empire to the pope not in mere sovereignty but in actual and immediate government, so that all the constitutions of ^e Qu. v. 6 p. 54.

^f Cf. art. 1 p. 50.

^g Qu. vi. pp. 56 sq.

^h Art. 2 p. 58.

ⁱ Qu. xl. pp. 230 sqq.
^k Qu. xxxv. 1 p. 206.

^l Art. 2-8 pp. 206-211.

^m Qu. xxxvi. 1 p. 212.

ⁿ V. supra, p. 247 n. 20.

came broadened into a general opposition between the church and the civil government of each individual kingdom. The consolidation of the French and English monarchies had raised up two forces with which it was far harder for the pope to grapple, than it had been, at all events in recent times, in the case of the empire. For apart from the fact that these powers were growing, while the German was declining, in solidity and in national feeling, they had had no tradition which made them coördinate with the apostolic see, and which therefore might appear as a standing menace to the latter; they were in one sense beneath its dignity, and therefore all the freer to expand at their own will and to defy the intrusion of papal claims. The assertion of a national consciousness found imitators, and in Rome itself there were fitful and abortive endeavours (those of Arnold of Brescia in the twelfth, and of Rienzi in the fourteenth, century are notorious) to dissociate the city from the curia and to justify the lineage of the people by an idle claim to elect or to supersede the emperor. In the second place, when the empire did revive, it was but a shadow of its old self. The title of emperor, or of king of the Romans (for the higher style was by no means regularly added), became insensibly a mere ornamental adjunct to a principality which had only a real existence, let us say, in Bavaria, in Austria, or in Bohemia: at best its holder was but a German sovereign, and each attempt to achieve the higher distinction of the empire, and to supplement the crown of Aix by those of Milan and Arles and Rome, ended in increasingly disastrous failure. It was exactly this period of decline that produced a literature in which the imperial idea was developed and glorified to a splendour unthought of hitherto. No less

CHAP. VIII.

CHAP. VIII. exaggerated are the claims now put forward for its rival.

For in the third place, while the vitality of the empire was diminishing, the church was making rapid steps towards occupying the prerogatives left unclaimed or unrealised by it. As early as the middle of the twelfth century an anxious observer had remarked ^mthat men spoke more of the Roman curia than of the Roman church. It was becoming a state among states while it aspired to be the supreme state that commanded and united all inferiors. Innocent the Third had made in his person the 'vicegerent of Peter' into the 'vicegerent of Christ;' and with Innocent the papacy reached its zenith. Nor did it for a long time exhibit any symptoms of decline. The conqueror of the empire fell beneath the defiance of the French king Philip the Fair, or more truly beneath the irresistible opposition of a strong national spirit in the kingdoms of Europe. The universal authority of Rome became confined within the narrow territory of Avignon: the means by which it was exerted became more and more secular, diplomatic, mercantile; and its spiritual efficiency was so far impaired that the loyallest servants of the catholic church could stand forth as the stoutest champions against the policy of the papacy, just because that policy was seen to be the surest means towards the destruction of the church.

It is not a little remarkable that the secret of the reformation, namely, the incompatibility of the claims of the church with the rights of the different nations that formed it, should have been so early discovered. But it was inevitable that, once the discovery was made, once the standard was raised against the encroachments (for so they were bitterly felt) of the papacy, the crusade should be extended to the abuses or deficiencies which were too obvious within the constitutional or dogmatic fabric of the church itself; and the heresies of Wycliffe or Hus were a natural outcome of the resistance provoked by Boniface the Eighth or John the Twenty-Second. It is not our purpose to follow the history to these issues: it is only necessary to observe that they were involved essentially in the conflict caused by the widened claims of the church. The political results of this conflict will come before us in the following chapter, but to make its precise conditions clear we have preliminarily to educe from the writings of the papal party the precise figure which the conception of the church took in their minds.

^m Gerhoh. Reichersp. ep. ad Henr. card., i. ii. Migne 194. 9 sq.

The time when Gregory the Ninth consolidated the canon law, that fertile source of fabulous ideas of history, is well known to coincide with a general failure of historical insight and historical veracity, which operated well-nigh as strongly upon the actors in the events of this period as upon its chroniclers. Fictions were everywhere accepted as truth and used recklessly to explain existing facts; and among these fictions two had a diffusion and influence which it is difficult to overestimate. One of these, the Donation, by virtue of which Constantine was alleged to have abdicated his imperial authority in Italy (¹⁰it was afterwards said, in all parts of the west²⁰) in favour of the successor of saint Peter, had been used ^{as early as the middle of the eleventh century as a}

CHAP. VIII.

²⁰ Doellinger, papst-fabeln pp. 73, 83; Friedberg i. 8.
¹⁰ Doellinger 77.

¹⁰ Thus Augustin Trionfo: Ad papam pertinet immediate imperii plena iurisdictio. Postquam enim Constantinus cessit imperio occidentali, nulla sibi reservatione facta, in civitate Romana, in partibus Italiae, et in omnibus occidentalibus regionibus, plenum ius totius imperii est acquisitum summis pontificibus, non solum superioris dominationis, verum etiam immediatae adminis-

trationis, ut ex ipsis tota dependeat imperialis iurisdictio, quantum ad electionem et quantum ad confirmationem: ita ut extunc nullus de iure potuerit se intromittere de regimine occidentalis imperii absque expressa auctoritate et mandato sedis apostolicae, nisi usurpative et tyrannice: De potest. eccl. xxxviii. 1 p. 224.

CHAP. VIII. candidates neither of whom possessed, one of whom hardly aspired to, the shadow of real power. No emperor was again crowned until thirty years after Aquinas' death; and he was naturally led to the inference that the empire was absorbed into, or reunited with, the mother-church: it has not ceased, he said, *but is changed from the temporal to the spiritual*¹⁹. It is indeed evident that his view of the unique position of the church was one that could admit no rival to her in the secular state. But on the other hand the express preference which Thomas displays for nationality as the basis of the state, shows that he had learned, what the civilians remained ignorant of, that the world had outgrown the imperial conception; which notwithstanding still survived, always less and less of a reality, for upwards of five hundred years. Aquinas wrote in fact on the eve of a revolution in the history of European politics, not the less momentous because its results were defined in no external changes of government, dynasty, or frontier, were almost impalpable to contemporaries, and left all parties for the time as clamorous, as assertive, as before.

This change may be regarded in three sections. First, the opposition between the church and the empire bea fide catholica Romanae ecclesiae.' Expos. in 2 ad Thess. ii. opp. 16. 172 E. Cf. J. Bryce, The holy Roman Empire 114 n. 2. A curious gloss was given at an earlier time, during the contest concerning investitures, by Bonizo bishop of Sutri, namely, that the empire spoken of in the prophecy was the eastern; the western had already long been annihilated in consequence of the vices of its rulers. See Doellinger, Das Kaiserthum Karls des Grossen und seiner Nachfolger, in the Münchener historische Jahrbuch für 1865 pp. 387 sqq.

¹⁹ The coming of Antichrist, it was believed, would be heralded by a discessio, a departure from the faith and a secession from the Roman empire of part of its subjects. 'Sed quomodo est hoc?' asks saint Thomas; 'quia iamdiu gentes recesserunt a Romano imperio, et tamen necdum venit Antichristus. Dicendum est quod nondum cessavit, sed est commutatum de temporali in spirituale, ut dicit Leo papa in sermone de Apostolis: et ideo dicendum est quod discessio a Romano imperio debet intelligi non solum a temporali sed a spirituali, id est

came broadened into a general opposition between the church and the civil government of each individual kingdom. The consolidation of the French and English monarchies had raised up two forces with which it was far harder for the pope to grapple, than it had been, at all events in recent times, in the case of the empire. For apart from the fact that these powers were growing, while the German was declining, in solidity and in national feeling, they had had no tradition which made them coördinate with the apostolic see, and which therefore might appear as a standing menace to the latter; they were in one sense beneath its dignity, and therefore all the freer to expand at their own will and to defy the intrusion of papal claims. The assertion of a national consciousness found imitators, and in Rome itself there were fitful and abortive endeavours (those of Arnold of Brescia in the twelfth, and of Rienzi in the fourteenth, century are notorious) to dissociate the city from the curia and to justify the lineage of the people by an idle claim to elect or to supersede the emperor. In the second place, when the empire did revive, it was but a shadow of its old self. The title of emperor, or of king of the Romans (for the higher style was by no means regularly added), became insensibly a mere ornamental adjunct to a principality which had only a real existence, let us say, in Bavaria, in Austria, or in Bohemia: at best its holder was but a German sovereign, and each attempt to achieve the higher distinction of the empire, and to supplement the crown of Aix by those of Milan and Arles and Rome, ended in increasingly disastrous failure. It was exactly this period of decline that produced a literature in which the imperial idea was developed and glorified to a splendour unthought of hitherto. No less

CHAP. VIII.

CHAP. VIII. exaggerated are the claims now put forward for its rival. For in the third place, while the vitality of the empire was diminishing, the church was making rapid steps towards occupying the prerogatives left unclaimed or unrealised by it. As early as the middle of the twelfth century an anxious observer had remarked ^mthat men spoke more of the Roman curia than of the Roman church. It was becoming a state among states while it aspired to be the supreme state that commanded and united all inferiors. Innocent the Third had made in his person the 'vicegerent of Peter' into the 'vicegerent of Christ;' and with Innocent the papacy reached its zenith. Nor did it for a long time exhibit any symptoms of decline. The conqueror of the empire fell beneath the defiance of the French king Philip the Fair, or more truly beneath the irresistible opposition of a strong national spirit in the kingdoms of Europe. The universal authority of Rome became confined within the narrow territory of Avignon: the means by which it was exerted became more and more secular, diplomatic, mercantile; and its spiritual efficiency was so far impaired that the loyallest servants of the catholic church could stand forth as the stoutest champions against the policy of the papacy, just because that policy was seen to be the surest means towards the destruction of the church.

^m Gerhoh. Reichersp. ep. ad Henr. card., i. ii. Migne 194. 9 sq.

It is not a little remarkable that the secret of the reformation, namely, the incompatibility of the claims of the church with the rights of the different nations that formed it, should have been so early discovered. But it was inevitable that, once the discovery was made, once the standard was raised against the encroachments (for so they were bitterly felt) of the papacy, the crusade should be extended to the abuses or deficiencies which were too obvious within the constitutional or dogmatic fabric of the church itself; and the heresies of Wycliffe or Hus were a natural outcome of the resistance provoked by Boniface the Eighth or John the Twenty-Second. It is not our purpose to follow the history to these issues: it is only necessary to observe that they were involved essentially in the conflict caused by the widened claims of the church. The political results of this conflict will come before us in the following chapter, but to make its precise conditions clear we have preliminarily to educe from the writings of the papal party the precise figure which the conception of the church took in their minds.

The time when Gregory the Ninth consolidated the canon law, that fertile source of fabulous ideas of history, is well known to coincide with a general failure of historical insight and historical veracity, which operated well-nigh as strongly upon the actors in the events of this period as upon its chroniclers. Fictions were everywhere accepted as truth and used recklessly to explain existing facts; and among these fictions two had a diffusion and influence which it is difficult to overestimate. One of these, the Donation, by virtue of which Constantine was alleged to have abdicated his imperial authority in Italy (¹⁹it was afterwards said, in all parts of the west²⁰) in favour of the successor of saint Peter, had been used ^{as early as the middle of the eleventh century as a}

CHAP. VIII.

¹⁹ Doellinger, papst-fabeln pp. 73, 83; Friedberg i. 8.
²⁰ Doellinger 77.

¹⁹ Thus Augustin Trionfo: Ad papam pertinet immediate imperii plena iurisdictio. Postquam enim Constantinus cessit imperio occidentali, nulla sibi reservatione facta, in civitate Romana, in partibus Italiae, et in omnibus occidentalibus regionibus, plenum ius totius imperii est acquisitum summis pontificibus, non solum superioris dominationis, verum etiam immediatae adminis-

trationis, ut ex ipsis tota dependeat imperialis iurisdictio, quantum ad electionem et quantum ad confirmationem: ita ut extunc nullus de iure potuerit se intromittere de regimine occidentalis imperii absque expressa auctoritate et mandato sedis apostolicae, nisi usurpative et tyrannice: De potest. eccl. xxxviii. 1 p. 224.

CHAP. IX. former can be valid⁷. He at once applies this axiom to demolish the favourite theory, "at least as old as Gregory the Seventh, which found in the relation of the sun to the moon an apt and conclusive evidence of the subordination of the secular to the spiritual power, and which "suggested a variety of arithmetical puzzles as to the exact amount of their proportional magnitudes⁸.

^a Cf. Bryce 267 n. 2.

^c Du Bois, p. 677.

It was in fact in the purely critical work of controversy that the assailants of the hierarchy had almost uniformly the advantage: when they passed from criticism to the building up of a system of their own, their proposals are, in the view of a political philosopher, hardly less weak than those of their opponents. The French, as we have said, write with greater freedom than their imperial brethren; but in the latter too we find no lack of skill, no lack even of historical perception: and if their ablest recruits were drawn from the university of Paris, still the man who overtopped them all in the abstract splendour of his ideal was an independent Italian. Yet Dante's books *De Monarchia*⁹, striking as they are, labour under the inevitable defect attaching to the attempt to exchange one impossible theory for another equally impossible. Supposing the human race to be entirely homogeneous, one might at once concede Dante's main proposition that the right and necessary form of government^p is that of one universal state by a sole universal ruler. But in truth he has no practical arguments to adduce in favour of this, only the ^p De monarch. i. 7-18.

⁷ The same statement occurs in the Supplication "du pueble de France au roy contre le pape Boniface le VIII, Dupuy 216, — also nearly certainly the work of du Bois.
⁸ According to one calculation the pope was thus $7744\frac{1}{2}$ times greater than the emperor; another made the ratio as low as 47:1. See Friedberg i. 6 n. 4.

⁹ I have made use of the edition, with an Italian translation, of A. Torri Leghorn 1844.

general a priori principle of the virtue of unity, and the examples or precedents of ancient Rome. The resounding lines of the Aenëid on which ⁹he relies,

CHAP. IX.

⁹ Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento;
Hæc tibi erunt artes; pacisque imponere morem,
Parcere subiectis, et debellare superbos,

⁹ Lib. ii. 7.

⁹ Verg. Aen.
vi. 852 sqq.

might come genuinely enough from a witness of the age of Augustus: in the fourteenth century, with the empire at its nadir and the Ghibellins of no small part of Italy, and Dante himself, suffering under a common proscription, they ring almost as an irony. Dante's scheme, as ^{*}has been finely said, was proved not a prophecy but an epitaph.

^{*} Bryce p.
264.

If an attempt thus to restore the glories of the empire failed of fruit because it looked backward instead of forward, those of some of Dante's contemporaries, the literary allies of the emperor Lewis the Fourth, were not less unsuccessful because they erred in the opposite direction, because they proceeded on the basis of a more advanced polity which it needed centuries for men to understand. Both alike were disappointed by reason of their neglect of the actual circumstances of their own day. Beyond question the most notable of the latter class of theories is that of the Defensor Pacis, a book which announces a clear constitutional system such as in the present day either exists not at all or exists only in name in the greater part of Europe. Its author, Marsiglio dei Raimondini¹⁰, was one of those rare philosophers to whom fortune gave an opportunity of carrying their conceptions into practice; who discovered also that,

¹⁰ This is the family name, Marsilius de Raymundinis, given him by his friend Albertino Mussato; see Riezler 30. The alternative, 'de Maynardino,' appears in a document of 1328, the Examen iudiciale Francisci Veneti assecclæ Marsilii de Padua, Baluze, Miscell. 2. 280 a, ed. Mansi. Dr Friedberg, pt. 2. 21, writes Maynardina.

CHAPTER IX.

THE OPPOSITION TO THE TEMPORAL CLAIMS OF THE PAPACY.

CHAP. IX. THE eclipse of the empire in the latter part of the thirteenth century furnished an opportunity, of which we cannot wonder that the popes availed themselves, for augmenting and extending their political pretensions. Now however they were involved in a more difficult struggle, since an unsuspected obstacle had arisen in the growing national spirit of England and France. It is principally these changed conditions that make the pontificate of Boniface the Eighth a turning-point in the history of the mediæval papacy; and it is an interesting study to watch the interworkings of the new motives in political speculation, now that the oppressive weight of the imperial conception was for the time removed¹. One of the most curious essays in this regard is a treatise written in the latter part of the year 1300 by a certain royal advocate in Normandy, a person whom we may confidently identify with Peter du Bois, who held that office in the bailliage of Coutances, and is that what I refer to as the second volume of Goldast's Monarchia s. Romani Imperii appears as the third volume in the reissue of that work, in which only the title-page and table of contents are new, dated 1621.

¹ In collecting materials for the present chapter I have derived very great assistance from the able work of Dr Riezler on Die literarischen Widersacher der Päpste zur Zeit Ludwig des Baiers. I may here notice

elsewhere known as a hot partisan of Philip the Fair CHAP. IX.
 in his contest with Boniface². The professed aim of this treatise is to give a short and easy method of avoiding wars so far as the king of France is concerned; and for this purpose, the author holds, "the best thing" for society would be that the whole world should be subject to French rule. For, he explains, it is a peculiar merit of the French to have a surer judgement than other nations, not to act without consideration, nor to place themselves in opposition to right reason. To reap the full advantage of the arrangement it is necessary moreover that the king should be born and bred in France,<sup>b Cf. p. 486 & n. 2.</sup> because experience teaches that there the stars present themselves under a better aspect and exercise a happier influence than in other countries.

These postulates being granted, du Bois proceeds to indicate the steps by which the desirable result might be attained. "He concedes the right of the papacy to"
 all the territories comprised in the grant of Constantine, but adds that it is plainly beyond the power of the pope to carry his rights into effect. Being commonly an old and infirm person, and since he is not and cannot be a soldier, his very position is an incitement to the ambition of wicked men. Wars therefore are stirred up; numbers of princes are condemned by the church with their adherents, and thus there die more people than one can count, whose souls probably go down into hell and whom nevertheless it is the pope's duty to guard and to preserve from all danger.

² See Natalis de Wailly, Mémoire sur un Opuscule anonyme intitulé Summaria brevis et com-pendiosa Doctrina felicitis Expeditionis et Abbreviationis Guerrarum ac Litium Regni Francorum, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des

Inscriptions et des Belles-lettres 18 (2) 435-494; 1849. M Wailly is able to fix the date minutely, pp.
 471-476, and speculates with much acuteness and ingenuity about the author and his other works, pp.
 481-493.

CHAP. IX. If however he should surrender his temporal domain, he would be all the freer to devote himself to the proper functions of his office, and a main cause of strife would be removed. But the means by which our speculator proposes to secure this end show with singular directness how entirely the papacy had come to be regarded, not as a spiritual power standing apart from and above the temporal polity of Europe, but as a state to be treated with like any other state. The diplomatic agency, we read, of the king of Sicily might be employed to obtain from the church the title of senator of Rome for the French king, who should receive the holy patrimony, the city of Rome, Tuscany, the coasts and the mountains, Sicily, England, Aragon, and all the other countries, in exchange for an adequate pension to the pope,

^d PP. 445-449. their present sovereign. ^d Lombardy itself, it is explained, although legally subject to the king of Germany, should offer no insuperable difficulties; since its nominal ruler is well aware of the hopelessness of undertaking its reduction to a state of real vassalage, and therefore everything might be easily arranged by a secret treaty either with himself or his electors³. This being secured it would perhaps be necessary to conquer the Lombards; any expedient would be lawful against them since nothing could authorise them to refuse obedience to their prince; and it is clear that they would in time yield to the force of arms assisted by the ravaging of their lands and the ruin of their commerce. The conquest of Lombardy would create so powerful an impression among other nations that the king of France could not fail soon to

³ The former, our author specifies, on the supposition that it is true, as is reported, that the king possesses, or ought to possess, the right of transmitting his kingdom to his heirs, p. 445. The notion does not seem to occur elsewhere.

receive the submission of the rest of Europe; and thus CHAP. IX.
a lasting peace would be secured for society.

A visionary scheme like this, the work of a layman and a lawyer, even with all its national vanity and exaggeration, is sufficiently indicative of the new horizon of political ideas that opened upon men in the end of the thirteenth century, to be deserving of comment. It shows us that the conception of the empire had already dwindled in the eyes of foreigners into that of a mere German kingdom, and that the temporal sway of the popes was seen to be the cause of endless mischief both to society and to the spiritual basis of the papacy itself. Nor can it escape notice that our theorist enunciates, as it were in a parenthesis, as a doctrine to which no one would think of objecting, that principle of necessary obedience to the temporal ruler which papal advocates — had always been inclined to throw into the background or even formally deny. It is in cases like this that the limitations of the medieval mind reveal themselves. To it only the two extremes are possible, absolute obedience to the sovereign or absolute obedience in all things to the church. When the supporters of the latter speak of civil rights they appear as though their single wish was to carry out what we should call a constitutional system; it is only when their correlative doctrine about the prerogative of the church is known, that we see how far they are removed from modern ideas: and in the same way it is regularly their opponents who are the defenders of pure, unrestrained absolutism, however much they may engage our approval when they argue against the temporal pretensions of the spirituality with all the attendant inconveniences of ecclesiastical exemptions and privileges, and urge a far-reaching reform of the entire

• Cf. ibid.,
pp. 450 sqq.,
461 sq.

' pp. 465-468.

CHAP. IX. church-system, a return to primitive purity and primitive simplicity⁴.

⁴ Ibid., p. 492; cf. Riezler 143.

⁵ Quaest. de potest. pap., p. 678.

But it would be an error to suppose that the views of the French publicists, on the relations of church and state, of which du Bois is perhaps the earliest exponent, correspond in more than the object of their common attack with those of the imperial partisans. In the *Enquiry touching the Power of the Pope*⁵, also ⁶in all probability the work of du Bois, we have a clear statement of the distinction between the relations of a kingdom like France⁶ to the pope, and those of the empire. The pope, he says, is evidently the temporal lord of the emperor; for the latter needs to be confirmed and crowned by the pope, whereas no such authorisation is required in France. Undoubtedly this freedom from traditionary, even though disputable, restraints upon the title of their sovereign, helped to give a broader and bolder scope to the speculations of French writers; and the head and front of the literary opposition to the papacy during the early part of the fourteenth century, was found in the university of Paris. Besides, as we ⁴ Compare the earlier instance of Robert Grosseteste in G. Lechler, Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation i. 192-200; 1873.

⁵ This treatise is printed by Pierre Dupuy in the collection of Acts et Preuves appended to the Histoire du Différend d'entre le Pape Boniface VIII et Philippes le bel, Roy de France, pp. 663-683, 1655 folio.

⁶ Dr Riezler speaks, within marks of quotation, of 'Frankreich und England,' as though the author had abandoned his previous notion (see above, p. 258) of the English vassalage. The difference indeed might lead one to conjecture that the hypothesis of the common authorship of this work and of the Summaria brevis just now described, was not so well grounded as we have affirmed. But the truth is that, instead of ranking England in the same class with France, du Bois expressly distinguishes its position: 'Aliquae causae sunt in imperatore quare subditus sit papae in temporalibus, quae non inveniuntur in aliquibus regibus, sicut in regibus Franciae et Hispaniae, et fuit etiam aliquando in rege Angliae, videlicet, usque ad tempus regis Ioannis, qui dicebatur Sine terra,' &c.: p. 681. The passage is therefore an argument for, not against, M de Wailly's conclusion.

have said, the idea of nationality, an idea fatal to the empire, was becoming well understood; and John Quiddort, better known as John of Paris, a contemporary of du Bois,¹ dwells upon this as the proper basis of political organisation just as strongly as Thomas Aquinas from an opposite point of view had done before him.

CHAP. IX.

¹ De potest. reg. et papal. iii, Goldast 2. xii sq.

Thus while the imperialists were more or less obliged to answer any given pretension of the papacy by another theory, possibly no less distorted, of their own, the French writers were able to discuss matters in a more philosophical spirit. Nothing for instance can be more admirable than the criticism of John of Paris with reference to the worldly possessions of the clergy. ^{*}The Waldenses, he says, maintain that these possessions, originating in the Donation of Constantine, are the root of the demoralisation of the church; while others hold that they are intrinsically involved in the prerogative of the pope as the vicar of Jesus Christ. The former alternative was no doubt tempting to the opponents of papal claims, but John's sound sense was not deceived by the convenience of the argument. ¹The truth, he decided, lay in the middle between the two extremes: the church might unquestionably have worldly property; but as a matter of fact she did not hold it by virtue of any vicarship or apostolical succession, but simply by way of grant from princes or other persons, or by similar titles of possession. With equally clear judgement du Bois disposed of the common use of Biblical phrases to prove anything that could be extracted from them by a violent adaptation of metaphor. It is no doubt usual, he says, ^mamong professors of theology to take a double sense in the words of Scripture, the literal or historical, and the mystical or spiritual: but for purposes of argument none but the

^{*} Proem., p. 108.

¹ Ibid., p. 109.

^m Quæst. de potest. pap., Dupuy 676; cf. Ockham, octo Quæst. ii. 12, Goldast 2. 344.

CHAP. IX.

* Cap. 18
pp. 187 sqq.

which purpose it is well that they should arm themselves with all possible knowledge, as well in the departments of thought as of action,—¹they have so far abandoned this exclusively spiritual function as to usurp all manner of temporal claims over temporal as well as spiritual persons, and in particular over the Roman emperor: and these pretensions of the papacy, Marsiglio holds, are the chief causes of discord in the world. Accordingly in his second book our author addresses himself to the examination of the real nature of the spiritual office, and of its relation to the civil state.

* Lib. ii. 2.

²The name church Marsiglio would recall to its first and apostolical, its truest and most proper signification, as comprehending the entire body of Christian men: all, he says, are alike churchmen, virī ecclesiastici, be they laymen or clerks. It is intolerable that its prerogatives should be usurped by the sacerdotal order. Excommunication, for instance, cannot be rightly decreed by any single priest or any council of priests: they should doubtless be consulted as experts with reference to the charges alleged, but the actual decision belongs to the congregation in which the offender lives, or to its superior, or to a general council¹⁹. While moreover the clergy have no right to engross the name of church-

* Ibid., p. 192. man, ²they have also no right to extend the application of the word spiritual to all they do, as when they use it to cover their property and incomes in order to exempt them from legal burthens or conditions. The clergy

¹⁹ I have translated the last two alternatives as they stand in Marsiglio's text, although they have rather the appearance of being saving clauses not very naturally connected with the argument: nor have I a distinct notion of what is meant by 'its superior,' which Dr Riezler, p. 211, renders by 'repräsentant.' The passage occurs in Goldast 2. 207 and belongs to the seventh chapter of book ii, which in the edition has been accidentally united with chapter 6.

have indeed a spiritual office in the church, but their dealings outside these definite functions, their tenure of land, their financial and other temporal engagements, are just as much worldly as those of their lay brethren, and are just as much subject to the law of the state. Who would say that a clergyman's crimes, should he commit theft or murder, were to be regarded as spiritual acts? ^{CHAP. IX.} These are evidently to be punished like other men's; ^{Cap. 8 p. 212.} only with greater strictness, because the culprits have not the same excuse of ignorance. The clergy are in these cases, and equally in all other civil relations, simply members of society, and as members of society they must be treated; they can claim no sort of exemption in virtue of their religious character. More than this, ^{Ibid., p. 213.} since the business of government is to maintain peace, it is the duty of the ruler to limit the number of clergymen in any part of the kingdom, should their growth appear likely to disturb the order and tranquillity of the state.

The power of the clergy is thus not only restricted to spiritual affairs; ^{Cap. 9 pp. 213-216.} it can only be given effect to by spiritual means. Temporal pains and penalties do not belong to the law of the Gospel, which indeed is not, properly speaking, a law at all but rather an injunction, doctrina; for it is not laid down that any man should be compelled to its observance, and coercive force is part of the definition of law. The priest then may warn and threaten, but beyond this he has no competence. ^{Cap. 10 pp. 216-219.} If a heretic become obnoxious to the civil law—if, in other words, his doctrine is dangerous to society—by that law he is to be tried: but of heresy, as such, there is but one judge, Jesus Christ, and his sentence is in the world to come; errors of opinion lie beyond the cognisance of CHAP. IX. any human judicature²⁰. Marsiglio has arrived at the fully matured principle of religious toleration, which modern writers are apt to vaunt as their own peculiar discovery, and which modern politicians, as the experience of recent years in England has shown us, are more ready to profess in theory than to carry into practice.

It may be objected to Marsiglio's entire view of the spirituality, that he seems to leave out of account the existing constitution of the church, that he seems to forget that custom had classified the priesthood in ascending orders of dignity and authority, each with its proper province of power and jurisdiction. °But in truth, he maintains, this arrangement is destitute of any scriptural warrant. In the New Testament bishop and priest are convertible designations of the same persons; and the popedom, however °convenient as symbolising the unity of the church, is none the less °a later development of which the historical growth is clearly traceable. Saint Peter had no superiority over the other apostles; but even supposing he had, it is hazardous to say that he communicated it to his successors in the Roman see, since °we cannot say for certain that he himself ever visited, far less was bishop of, Rome at all²¹. The °preëminence of the bishop of Rome proceeds in fact not from saint Peter's institution but from the connexion of the see with the capital of the Roman empire.

° Cap. 15
pp. 238-241.

° Cap. 22
pp. 264 sq.
° Cap. 16
pp. 241-244.

° Ibid.,
pp. 245 sq.

° Capp.
18, 22
pp. 252 sq., 268.

²⁰ Nemo quantumcunque peccans contra disciplinas speculativas aut operativas quascunque punitur vel arcetur in hoc seculo praevis in quantum huiusmodi, sed in quantum peccat contra praeceptum humanae legis; Cap. 10 p. 217.

²¹ Dr Riezler makes the singular remark, p. 215 n. 1, 'Marsiglio

übersieht hier dass Petrus nach Paulus nach Rom gekommen sein kann.' This is exactly the conclusion that Marsiglio inclines to adopt: 'Romae vero non contradico, sed verisimiliter teneo ipsum [Petrum] in hoc non praevenisse Paulum, sed potius e converso,' Cap. 16 p. 246.

^aThe supreme power in the church is the church itself, that is, a general council, formed of the clergy and laity alike, and convoked not by any pretended spiritual authority but by the source of all legislation and jurisdiction, the civil state. Thus constituted a general council may not only decide ecclesiastical questions but even proceed to excommunicate the temporal ruler and place his land under an interdict, just because it represents the authority of the universal church and speaks the voice of the entire community both in its spiritual and temporal capacities. That it has power over the pope follows necessarily from the principles already laid down.

It is evident then that the pope in his quality of ¹Christian bishop can claim no right of supreme judgment in human things, even over the clergy. If he possess any such right it must have been conceded to him by human authority; as a spiritual person he has absolutely none, and therefore properly he ought to possess none. ²The power bequeathed by Christ to the priesthood can only concern religious affairs: it is idle to suppose that in granting to it the keys of heaven and hell he gave any temporal jurisdiction. ³The keys open and close the door of forgiveness, but forgiveness is the act of God, determined by the penitence of the sinner. Without these conditions the priestly absolution is of no avail. ⁴The turn-key, claviger, is not the judge. As for the special proof of the pope's superiority to the secular estate taken from his act in ⁵the ceremony of crowning the emperor, a ceremony, it is plain, can confer no authority: it is but the symbol or public notification of a fact already existing. The same function as the pope has at the coronation of the emperor, belongs at

CHAP. IX.

^b Capp. 20, 21
pp. 256-263.¹ Cap. 22
pp. 267 sq.,
cf. capp. 5, 8
pp. 204, 212.² Cap. 3
p. 193.³ Cap. 6
pp. 205 sq.⁴ P. 209.⁵ Cap. 26
pp. 280 sqq.

CHAP. IX. that of the king of France to the archbishop of Rheims ; but who would call this prelate the superior of his king ? Marsiglio goes over the standard arguments in favour of the papal assumptions and rejects them one after another, partly by his resolute insistence on a literal interpretation of the text of Scripture, partly by his grand distinction between the sacred calling of the priesthood and their extrinsic or worldly connexions. With his ideal of a church in which these worldly ties have no existence, with his view of them as mere indications of the distance by which the actual church is removed from primitive purity, there is no room for any talk of ecclesiastical privileges or exemptions. The sole privilege of the clergy is their spiritual character. Temporal sovereignty or jurisdiction is an accident of their civil position ; and all inferences from the Bible which have been imagined to authorise it, such as °the famous argument of the two swords, are incompatible not only with the conception of a church but also with the plain meaning of the texts from which they are deduced.

• Chap. 28
pp. 299-300.

° John xviii.
36 ; def. pac.
ii. 4 pp. 195-99.
¶ Cf. Friedberg 2. 48
sq. ; Riezler
pp. 225-233.

° My kingdom is not of this world.

¶ The two books of the Defensor Pacis thus comprise, — though we have been able to give but the briefest abstract of a work which fills more than a hundred and fifty pages in folio in Goldast's edition of the original, — the whole essence of the political and religious theory which separates modern times from the middle ages. The significance of the reformation, putting theological details aside, lay in the substitution of a ministry serving the church, the congregation of Christian men, for a hierarchical class. The significance of the later political revolution, even now far from universally realised, lay in the recognition of the people as the source of government, as the sovereign power in the state. Both these ideas Marsiglio appropriated. He had not only a glimpse of them as from afar off: he thought them out, defined them, stated them with the clearest precision, so that the modern constitutional statesman, the modern protestant, has nothing to alter in their principle, has only to develop them and fill in their outline. Marsiglio may be stigmatised as a doctrinaire, but he belongs to that rarest class of doctrinaires whom future ages may rightly look back upon as prophets. It is this quality, this prescience of the new order for which the world was becoming ripe, that raises him above the whole body of antagonists to the hierarchical policy of the church in the middle ages. His great colleague Ockham, his successor Wycliffe, were immersed in the petty, or at best the transitory, interests of scholasticism. In theological doctrine Wycliffe may by some be considered to have done more signal service. But his thoughts and those of his fellows move within the confined limits of their own time. The political theory of Wycliffe, noble as it is, rests upon as wilful, as preposterous, a treatment of the Bible as that of any of his hierarchical adversaries. Carried into practice by those who were not able to appreciate his refinements, it resolved itself into a species of socialism which was immediately seen to be subversive of the very existence of society. Marsiglio of Padua on the contrary is almost entirely free from the trammels of tradition. Except when he urges the necessity of a return to evangelical poverty, and when he enlarges on the points at issue between the emperor Lewis and John the Twenty-Second, we are hardly recalled to the age in which he lived. But for these reminders we should be almost disposed to CHAP. IX. think his book a production of one of the most enlightened of the publicists, or of the advocates of civil and religious liberty, of the seventeenth century.

Yet there can be little doubt that Marsiglio learned very much from Ockham in the years when they worked together at Paris; but the principles which he then adopted, he elaborated with far greater independence than his friend. Ockham remains through all his writings first and foremost a scholastic theologian; Marsiglio ventures freely into the open field of political philosophy. Nor on the other hand can it be questioned that Ockham in his turn fell strongly under the influence of the Italian speculator. All his known works on ecclesiastical politics were produced at a time posterior to the publication of the Defensor Pacis. The latter was written while Marsiglio was still at Paris; it was in all probability the thoughts brought into train by its composition that decided him to throw in his lot with the Bavarian emperor. Ockham's writings on the contrary are the effect of his association in active resistance to the pope; they are the defence and justification of his action. Thus though Marsiglio ran far ahead of his elder contemporary, though he shows us so marked an advance upon any previous theory of the relation of church and state, Ockham's books are the later in point of time. In fact, while the former quite overleaps the confines of the middle ages, Ockham preserves the orderly sequence and continuity of medieval thought: and more than this, while Marsiglio in the daring of his speculation stands absolutely alone and without a successor, Ockham, in virtue of his greater conformity to the spirit of his day, not to speak of his eminence as a philosopher, unequalled among contemporaries and hardly surpassed by Thomas Aquinas or John of Duns, handed down a light which was never suffered to be extinguished, and which served as a beacon to pioneers of reform like Wycliffe and Hus. In politics, as well as in some points of doctrine, Ockham may be justly claimed as a precursor of the German reformers of the sixteenth century; but Marsiglio exercised no direct influence on the movement of thought. The truths which he brought into view had to be rediscovered, without even the knowledge that he had found them out beforehand, by the political philosophers of modern times.

Ockham indeed, with a philosophy that directly tended towards rationalism, was by far the more practical speculator than his swifter and bolder fellow-worker. He was more sensible of the difficulty, of the almost hopeless intricacy, of the problems that called for solution²². As strenuous as any man in 'contesting the 'plenitude of power' arrogated for the papacy, he was unwilling to transfer it to any other individual or to any body of human beings. The pope was no supreme autocrat; indeed 'the emperor was within certain limitations his natural judge. But if 'the pope was fallible, 'so also was a general council. Even such an assembly, of the most perfect composition,—²³ strictly representative, according to Marsiglio's scheme, both of clergy and laity, both (this is his own addition) of men and women²³,—

CHAP. IX.

Dial. pt. iii
tr. i lib. i.
9-16 Goldast
2. 780-786.

Pt. iii tr. ii
lib. iii. 17
p. 948.
Pt. i lib. v.
1-5 pp.
467-476.

Pt. iii tr. i
lib. iii. 5-13
pp. 822-831.
Pt. i lib. vi.
85 pp. 603 sqq.

²² The text of Ockham's Dialogus, of which a fragment (wanting the last six tractatus of the third part) fills five hundred and sixty of Goldast's closely printed pages, I do not pretend to have read consecutively through. Dr Riezler, pp. 258-271, has however selected a sufficient number of passages to illustrate Ockham's general position; and I have sometimes contented myself with verifying his citations in the original.

²³ The principal points of difference between Marsiglio and Ockham in this respect appear to me to be two: first, what Marsiglio intended as a regular part of the constitution,

CHAP. IX. he would not entrust with the absolute, final decision in matters of faith. ⁷ Any man, all men, may err; and Ockham is disposed in the last resort to find consolation in the scriptural paradox which speaks of the truth vouchsafed to little children. He is convinced that the faith must live, but cannot admit without qualification any of the suggested sureties for its maintenance. He is so embarrassed by the various alternatives that have been propounded, so persuaded of the elements of truth that each contains in different degrees, that he seems unable to form any fixed resolution on the whole subject. ⁸ Revelation of course cannot but be infallible, but he is not sure, or at least he does not tell us his opinion, of the limits to which the name is to be restricted. All that we can conclude with certainty is that Ockham does not extend its authority to the Decretals or to any part of the special Roman tradition.

One of the reasons why it is so difficult to affirm anything in detail about Ockham's views is that his principal works on the subject with which we are concerned are written in the form of a dialogue or of *quaestiones*²⁴.

the ordinary originator of legislation, Ockham thought of only as an instrument to be used in the last resort, in the case of the pope falling into heresy: the scheme of the one was political, that of the other was ecclesiastical. Secondly, unless Ockham was consciously committing himself to a paradox, he is distinguished from his colleague by the admission he makes of women to election to general councils, 'propter unitatem fidei virorum et mulierum, quae omnes tangit et in qua non masculus nec foemina. . . Et ideo ubi sapientia, bonitas, vel potentia mulierum esset tractatui fidei (de qua potissime est tractandum in concilio generali) necessaria, non est mulier a generali concilio excludenda:' p. 605. That Ockham was sensible of the ridicule with which the suggestion would be received, appears plainly from the opening of the following chapter. For the rest, there is always a possibility that Marsiglio at an earlier time drew a good deal from Ockham; still the date of the Defensor Pacis furnishes a presumption of the former having the priority in his general conclusions.

²⁴ With respect to the Dialogus I cannot help expressing the opinion that it was never written to form a single work. The second part admittedly stands by itself; and the third opens the whole subject method allows him to throw out the most startling assertions, but at the same time saves him from the necessity of formulating his own express answer. We in most cases left to guess it from a balance of more or less conflicting passages. Thus we are hardly even able to arrive at a clear view of his conception of the relation between the papacy, in themselves and in their mutual relations. ^aHe hints that in a certain state of affairs it might be better to have several popes and several sovereigns; and ^balthough he recognises in some of the claims of the theoretical universal empire, there is a clear air of unreality about his assertions which lets us see that he had not forgotten his English birth and English training. No human institution is absolute or eternal, and neither pope nor ^demperor can claim exemption from the general law of progress and adaptation. However at the present time, Ockham argues, the prerogative of the empire reaches over the entire world in its temporal relations, this must inevitably exclude the pope from all but spiritual functions. Ockham has travelled by a different road to the same point as Marsilius. Neither is really in love with the imperial idea: what is of importance to them is to erect the state as an organic, consolidated force independent of, and in its own province superior to, that of the spirituality; and

⁷ Pt. i lib. v. 25-35 pp. 494-506.

⁸ Pt. iii tr. i lib. iii. 1-4 pp. 819-822.

CHAP. IX.

^a Pt. iii tr. i
lib. ii. 25-30
pp. 812-819.

^b Ibid., tr. ii.
lib. i. 1-13.

^c Cf. Riezler
252 sq.

^d Cf. dial. pt.
iii tr. ii lib. i. 5
p. 876.

^e Ibid., lib. ii.
6-9 pp.
906-910.

first afresh, and comparatively assumes conclusions which might think had already been many times over (from the same point of view) in the first. It is also, unlike its predecessor, subdivided into tractatus as into books and chapters. In the composition of the work as it is, we may learn from the fact that Ockham's Opus nonaginta, Goldast 2. 993, which speaks of it as belonging to the sixth tractatus of the third part of the former work. If this was intended to be thus incorporated, why not also parts which we now find there? The question however, like most other literary questions about Ockham, must be left unsolved until the time when his complete works shall have been subjected to an analysis such as no one has yet ventured to undertake.

CHAP. IX. this done, they circumscribe even the spiritual part of the papal authority by making it in all respects subject to the general voice of Christendom. The pope remains the exponent of the church, but appeal is always open to the church, to the whole society, itself. The only difference in the results of the two theorists is that Marsiglio is confident, while Ockham hesitates, about the unerring sagacity of this final arbiter.

But there is, as we have said, a fundamental distinction between the way in which they approach their subject. Marsiglio proceeds from purely philosophical reasoning; theology he proves that he knew well, but he is not primarily a theologian. He is a clergyman, but he is not in regular orders. Ockham on the other hand starts from the point of view of a theologian and of a Franciscan. Now it is well-known that the point which of late years had roused the great body of the Franciscans to opposition to John the Twenty-Second, was the latter's condemnation of their newly proclaimed doctrine of the necessity of 'evangelical poverty.' 'From that day John became in their eyes a heretic; and although most of them had yielded to the papal threats in 1322-1324, yet the general of their order, Michael of Cesena, and a number of others, passed over to swell the ranks which supported Lewis the Bavarian. Among these was Ockham. It was thus a purely theological dispute, almost a mere matter of partisanship, from which he advanced to combat the general assumptions of the papacy. Once grant the doctrine that the clergy are bound to hold no property, and the whole territorial fabric of the Roman church falls to the ground. From this it is but a step, if it is not essentially involved in the same principle, to refuse to the clergy any ompend.

Cf. Ockham.
error. papae,
, v Goldast
: 958, 964 sq.;
Liezler 59-71.

temporal jurisdiction or in fact any temporal position whatsoever. With Marsiglio on the contrary the doctrine of 'evangelical poverty' is the consequence, not the premise, of his argument; it flows inevitably from the larger doctrine of the spiritual character of the clergy. Still, now as often, it was the narrower view which retained the stronger attraction for political thinkers; and thus, while Marsiglio's influence upon posterity is hardly traceable, Ockham left an unbroken line of successors until the enduring elements in his aims found a partial realisation in the religious revolution of the sixteenth century.

CHAPTER X.

WYCLIFFE'S DOCTRINE OF LORDSHIP.

CHAP. X. IN examining the various theories held in the middle ages concerning the relations of the civil and spiritual powers, two points in particular attract our notice. One is the marked disproportion between these theories and the facts which they were intended to support or overthrow. A prince might brave excommunication or interdict, might persuade himself and his adherents that such acts were invalid and of no effect unless duly, that is, divinely, authorised; he might ridicule the pretension of the spirituality to exercise them. Yet when once the decree was pronounced, it was never long before the stoutest champion of national rights found himself isolated among a people to whom the interdict was a terrible reality, insensibly subsided into the same terror, and ended by meekly accepting the doctrine which he had but now repudiated. ^aThe pope on his side might declare his indefeasible, absolute right to every sort of privilege in every land: over certain countries he might claim immediate sovereignty. But no pope ever thought of carrying the complete doctrine into practice. If Gregory the Seventh be considered an exception, the fact remains certain that he omitted to take any steps to enforce that ^bfeudal relation which he once claimed over England, and which William the Conqueror pointedly rejected. The phrase of the plenary jurisdiction and plenary lordship of the vicar of Christ served indeed well enough for manifestoes meant to animate men's loyalty; but when any specific demand had to be made and met, the high-sounding words were virtually exchanged for the more practical language of barter and the common chicane of the market. Neither party could afford to negotiate on their theoretical footing.

^a Cf. Milman, hist. of Lat. Christ. 4. 32-36.

^b Stubbs, const. hist. of Engl. § 101.

The other peculiarity to which we have referred, is the medley of systems and maxims which had to do duty in the middle ages as the factors of a political philosophy. One theorist extracted from the Old Testament the model of an hierarchy; another read in Aristotle principles nearly approaching those of a modern constitutional polity. The civil law added something, added much to the imperialists' systems; the canon-law, with its wonderful adaptations of Biblical texts, was of no less value to the curialists. But the basis of all was either the Bible of the Christians or the Bible of the philosophers, the Scriptures or Aristotle. And what is perhaps the most curious fact of all is that none of the opponents of papal claims (the advocates were naturally contented with their own canon-law) make any attempt to adjust their schemes to the political or legal framework of their own country. The publicists not only of France but even of England and Germany, write as though the state were constructed on an Aristotelian basis or at most as though its only law was that of the Roman jurisconsults. To this rule however there is one exception, an exception perhaps more illustrative of it than any direct confirmation. For the most ideal scheme of polity conceived in the middle ages, and the furthest removed from practical possibility, was also one

CHAP. X. modelled closely on the organisation of feudalism. This is the Doctrine of Lordship, suggested indeed by a previous English writer but so appropriated and matured by John of Wycliffe that he may be fairly considered its author¹.

In introducing the name of Wycliffe it is well to state at the outset that we have nothing here to do with his position as a precursor of protestant theology. The works in which he first treated the subject of lordship were the production of his years of teaching at Oxford; in these the doctrine is completely developed, and his later writings do but presuppose and resume their contents. At this time he was earnest indeed in exposing the political abuses of the hierarchy, but in dogmatic theology he was without blemish². His criticism was directed against the outer not the inner organisation of the church, and in such criticism he was the ally of many of the loyallest catholics. They saw as he did that the church was falling under the weight of an administration into which the vices of the

¹ The relation between Wycliffe's doctrine and that of Richard fitz-Ralph, archbishop of Armagh, was, I think, first pointed out by Mr F. D. Matthew in his introduction to the volume of English Works of Wyclif hitherto unpublished which he edited for the early English text-society in 1880, p. xxxiv. The fact is confirmed in many details by so much as I have read of fitzRalph's treatise De pauperie salvatoris in the Bodleian manuscript, auct. f. infra, i. 2.

² The nineteen conclusions condemned by Gregory the Eleventh in his bulls of May 1377 relate exclusively to ecclesiastical politics, church-lands, the power of excommunication, and the like. Only one can be held to be of dogmatic significance; that, namely, which asserts that every priest has the power of dispensing the sacraments and of absolving the penitent: nr xvi, in J. Lewis, History of the Life and Sufferings of John Wiclif 317, 2nd ed., Oxford 1820 (nr xv, according to the Fasciculi zizaniorum 253, ed. W. W. Shirley, 1858, Rolls series). But this too when read in the light of the context in Wycliffe's original, De civili dominio i. 38 cod. Vindob. 1341 f. 93 B, proves to be of political purport; since the explanation runs, 'Nam quantum ad potestatem ordinis omnes sacerdotes sunt pares, licet potestas inferioris rationabiliter sit ligata.' This has been already noticed by Dr Lechler, Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation i. 573 n. 2.

world had entered almost too deep to be eradicated. The necessity of reform was becoming gradually felt throughout Christendom; and except among those whose interests were identified with the existing state of affairs, the only question related to the means of carrying the reform into effect. It is important to bear this fact in mind, lest we should infer (as we are apt to infer, knowing Wycliffe's later history) that in resisting Roman encroachments he was therefore also resisting the current of catholic feeling. He was acting in truth as many catholic Englishmen had done before him. His Christianity did not efface his patriotism, and it was with honest reverence for the papacy that he sought to free it from those mundane temptations which had long proved an obstacle to its real work of guiding the spirits of men.

Since almost every particular in Wycliffe's life has been made the subject of eager controversy, it is perhaps desirable that we should preface our account of his doctrine of lordship by a short sketch of his history as far as the time when he framed and published that doctrine. For the place of his birth we are dependent upon two notices of John Leland; one of which states that he "drew his origin from the house of Wycliffe, settled in the village of Wycliffe-upon-Tees, the other that he was born at Ipreswel, now known as Hipswell, in the immediate neighbourhood of Richmond in Yorkshire".³ The date

³ A long dispute about the place arose from a misprint in Hearne's edition of the Itinerary of Leland. It so happens that the original manuscript in the Bodleian library is defective exactly at the point where the name ought to occur, vol. v. fol. 114 b, and that of the various existing transcripts only one,

John Stow's (cod. Tanner. 464), was made before the manuscript was mutilated. Stow therefore remains our sole authority for the name; but his handwriting is perfectly unambiguous, and the word is Ipreswel. This, as I pointed out in the Athenaeum newspaper, nr 2960, p. 82 (July 19 1884), Hearne

² Collectan.
2. 329.

CHAP. X.

⁴ Shirley, intr., p. xi
n. 1.

we can only conjecture; but as he died in 1384, it is natural to fix it somewhere about the year 1320⁴. The well-ascertained connexion which subsisted between the family of Wycliffe and Balliol College, no doubt determined his enrolment at that foundation when he entered the university of Oxford; but considerable obscurity hangs over the details of his subsequent career. A confusion of dates has given rise to the common belief that he was at first a member of the Queen's college, and a confusion with a namesake has set him down as seneschal of Merton⁵. But it may be taken as proved that Wycliffe began and continued at Balliol, where he must have been a fellow, until in or before the year 1360 he was elected master of the college. Very shortly however he withdrew for a time from the active work of the university to the seclusion of a college living. In the spring of 1361 he was instituted to the rectory of Fillingham in Lincolnshire, and not long afterwards gave up his office at Balliol⁶, since

⁵ Ibid., p. 515. he is found to have occupied rooms at Queen's at various quite inexcusably read as Sprewel, mistaking the capital I for a long s; and from that day to this every single biographer of Wycliffe has perplexed himself (Dr Robert Vaughan's exploits in the search are notorious) in endeavouring to discover a place which owed its existence purely to a scriptural error.

⁴ Dr Lechler vol. i. 268 sq., thinks 1320 the latest date possible. Shirley however was inclined to place it some years later: Fasciculi zizaniorum, intr., p. xii. The traditional date, since Lewis's conjecture, p. 2, has been 1324.

⁵ The former supposition is refuted by Shirley, intr., pp. xii, xiii; the latter is to my mind decisively invalidated by the arguments of the same writer, pp. 513-516, as well as by those adduced by Peter Lorimer, in his notes to the English translation of Dr Lechler's Wiclif, ed. 1881. It seems indeed perfectly clear that Balliol and Merton in Wycliffe's time formed the opposite poles of the academical world. I notice that a curious way of explaining the difficulty has lately been suggested by the rev. A. R. Pennington, John Wiclif, his Life, Times, and Teaching, pp. 40 sq. (1884), namely, that the lustre of Wycliffe's name induced the fellows of Merton to elect a member from a rival college. At this rate one might prove anything.

⁶ He first appears as master in 1360; see Lorimer, ubi supra, p. 133. The later dates are April and July 1361: Shirley, intr., p. xiv notes 4 and 5.

times between 1363 and 1380. It is natural to connect his return to Oxford with his advancement to the degree of doctor in divinity, a step which he is believed to have taken between the years 1361 and 1366⁷; and the renewed intercourse with the university, the attraction of schools and disputations, may have made it more difficult for him to feel at home in his country parsonage. At all events 'in 1368 he obtained two years' leave of absence, to the end that he might devote himself to the study of letters in the university. ^{¶ Ibid., p. 527.} In November of that year he ^{¶ Ibid., intr., pp. xxxviii, xxxix.} quitted the rectory in exchange for the living of Ludgarshall in Buckinghamshire, and nearly six years later (to pass on for a moment to the sequel of his preferments in the church) the crown presented him to the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire. At Lutterworth he died on the 31st December 1384.

From this bare summary of his official career one might think that there was little room for Wycliffe's remarkable influence as a teacher at Oxford. Yet although his principle of clerical duty did not apparently allow him to hold more than one living at a time, he seems not to have scrupled to spend a great part of the year in the university; and he has even been supposed on no contemptible authority to have filled the post of warden of Canterbury-hall, a foundation of which the site is now occupied by a portion of Christ Church, between the years 1365 and 1367⁸. As to this matter it

⁷ See Shirley, intr., p. xvii. Dr Lechler, Johann von Wiclif i. 313 sqq., places the date later, between 1365 and 1374; but only on account of his supposed connexion with Canterbury hall.

⁸ Almost everyone has now accepted this identification. The best argument in its support appeared in the Church quarterly Review 5. 119-141, October 1877. On the other hand Shirley's observations in the Fasciculi zizaniorum 513-528 remain of high critical value; although he erred in underestimating the authority of a contemporary chronicle, which he knew only from a translation of the six-is only necessary to notice that a certain John Wycliffe was appointed to that office, and afterwards expelled in order to make room for a monk. The deprived warden appealed to Rome and lost his case. Now, this being known, when a religious agitator of the same name had made himself objectionable to the correct catholics of his day, and in particular to the religious orders, it was all but inevitable that the antecedent history of the one should attach itself to the other. There are indeed strong grounds for believing that the warden of Canterbury-hall was the same person with the seneschal of Merton whose name, as we have already seen, has caused a certain amount of confusion in the reformer's biography. But if on the whole we are inclined to reject the connexion of the latter with Canterbury-hall, it is right that we should explain that this decision is in no degree owing to the scandal which Wycliffe's opponents have discovered in his ejection by the archbishop of Canterbury. So far as we can see, there was nothing discreditable to either party in the transaction, and nothing discreditable to the pope who dismissed Wycliffe's appeal, or to the English king who confirmed the papal sentence. It was simply a dispute, one of teenth century, but of which the original has recently been discovered by Mr E. Maunde Thompson. See the latter's edition of the Chronicon Angliae 1328-1388 p. 115; 1874 Rolls series. To my mind one of the strongest arguments in favour of our Wycliffe having been warden of Canterbury-hall lies in the fact that Middleworth who had been at Merton and who was made fellow of Canterbury-hall at the same time with Wycliffe, was also at a later date resident, as Wycliffe was, at Queen's; but, as Shirley points out, pp. 519 sq., there was really not much choice, at a time when only six colleges existed and not all were open to all comers. As for the extract printed by Dr Lechler, vol. 2. 574 sq., and in part by Shirley, p. 526, from Wycliffe's treatise De ecclesia, it seems to me to decide nothing; Dr Lechler's inference from the passage depends entirely on the force of a comparative, in familiariori exemplo, and those who are best acquainted with Wycliffe's grammar will be the least disposed to attach weight to a point of this kind.

CHAP. X.

a kind that constantly arose, between the secular and the regular clergy. At the same time if the reformer be actually the person who was thus deprived we shall no doubt be right in looking upon this event in his personal history as one of the elements which produced his subsequent rancour against the monastic system⁹.

CHAP. X.

To whatever decision we arrive with respect to this affair, it remains certain that Wycliffe continued active in the Oxford schools; and this is all that we are here concerned to know, since it was not until many years later that he became conspicuous as a leader of opposition to the established doctrine of the church. Yet even now he had made himself a name outside of Oxford. He was, it seems, a ^hchaplain to the king, and had already entered the lists of controversy as an advocate, though in guarded terms, of the rights of the English nation as against the papal claim to tribute from it. In the tract to which we refer¹⁰ he puts in the mouth of seven lords in council the arguments which might be urged against this claim; and to one of these speakers he gives the announcement of his own special doctrine of lordship. This was in

^h Determ.,
ap. Lewis 349.

⁹ Thus far I am ready to go with the reverend father Joseph Stevenson, whose papers on the subject, published in the Month magazine of August and September 1884, are animated rather by the zeal of a convert than by the critical temper that might have been expected from the author's lifelong training in historical investigation. No doubt an equal prejudice affects by far the majority of writers on the protestant side.

¹⁰ The Determinatio quedam magistri Johannis Wycliff de dominio is printed by Lewis, pp. 349-356; not however, as Dr Lechler, vol. 2. 322 n. 1, seems to suggest, as an excerpt: its fragmentary condition is due to the manuscript itself, which is in the Bodleian library, arch. Seld. B. 26 [olim 10] ff. 54 sqq. I agree with Mr F. D. Matthew, intr., p. vi, as against Shirley, intr., p. xix, Lechler, vol. 1. 330, and apparently Milman, vol. 8. 163, that this does not contain a report in the strict sense of the word. Wycliffe was very likely present at the debate in parliament; but even though he may give what he supposes that the lords said, or ought to have said, still the language, the arrangement, and a good deal of the argument, are unmistakably Wycliffe's own. Wycliffe refers to the Responsio septem dominorum in his De civili dominio iii. 7 cod. Vindob. 1340 f. 41 B.

CHAP. X.

¹ Shirley, intr., p. xvii. 1366: perhaps at this very time, ¹hardly in any case very long after, he was engaged in his treatise Of the Lordship of God. About five years later he supplemented the work by a more extensive treatise Of civil Lordship; so that by 1371 or 1372 his views on this characteristic subject were fully formed and given to the world¹¹.

Lordship and service, in Wycliffe's scheme, are the two ends of the chain which links humanity to God. Lordship is not indeed a part of the eternal order of things, since ²it only comes into existence by the act of creation: God in the first chapter of Genesis becomes Lord in the second, because there are now creatures to be his servants; just as ¹the lower animals are put in the relation of servants by the creation of man. Lordship and service are thus necessarily correspondent terms, including, but not identical with, other terms of human relation. ²Lordship for instance presupposes

¹ De dominio divino, i. 2 cod. Vindob. 1339 f. 3 C, D.

¹ Cap. 1 f. 2 A.

² Cap. 2 f. 3 B, C.

right and power, and the exercise of either; but it is not the same with them: it cannot exist without the coexistence of an object to operate upon¹²; whereas a man may have right without actual possession, and

¹¹ These works I am now preparing for publication by the Wyclif society. I have not at present found reason to modify the view put forward by Shirley, intr., pp. xvii, xxi n. 2, with respect to their date. My citations are taken from transcripts in my possession of the original codices which are preserved in the palace library at Vienna: the De dominio divino from nr 1339 (which I sometimes correct from two other copies in the same library, numbered 1294 and 3935); and the De civili dominio from the only copy known to be in existence, books i, ii from nr 1341, and book iii from nr 1340. I should perhaps add that, as my work on these treatises is still incomplete, the following account of the doctrine they contain is only a tentative sketch.

¹² Ius ergo, cum sit fundamentum domini, licet sapiat relacionem respectu cuius dicitur ius, non tamen est formaliter ipsum dominium; sicut vis generativa patris non est formaliter ipsa paternitas, sed ad ipsum ut fundamentum pro aliquo tempore requisita. Et per ipsum sequitur quod potestas non sit genus domini: nam dominium dependet a possessore serviente vel suo principaliter [cod. 1294: al. principium] terminante; sed nulla potestas sic dependet, ergo nullum dominium est potestas: De dominio divino i. 2 f. 3 B; cf. cap. 1 f. 2 B.

power without the means of exercising it. No catholic, for instance, will deny that the power of the keys is committed to the priest, albeit he have none subjected to his power. Lordship then is neither a right nor a power; it is a *habit of the reasonable nature*¹³, essentially involved in the existence of that nature, and irrespective of any condition except that of being set above something inferior to it. Thus, in the case of the Creator, it seems probable that his lordship is immediate and of itself, by virtue of the act of creation, and not by virtue of his government or conservation of the universe. °It surpasses all other lordship because God stands in no need of service, because it is sure and irremovable, and because it meets with universal service.

CHAP. X.

Ibid., f. 4 A.

° Cap. 3 ff. 5 C-6 A.

As yet we are in the midst of scholastic definitions and distinctions; but Wycliffe soon finds occasion to state what may be called the fundamental principle of his theory. God, he says, rules not mediately through the rule of subject vassals, as other kings hold lordship, since immediately and of himself he makes, sustains, and governs all that which he possesses, and helps it to perform its works according to other uses which he requires. There is a feudalism here, but a feudalism in which there are no mesne lords; all men hold directly of God, with differences no doubt in accidentals, but in the main fact of ° Cap. 5 f. 11 A.

° Cap. 4 ff. 7 D-8 B.

¹³ Dominium est habitudo nature rationalis secundum quam denominatur suo prefici servienti: cap. 1 f. 1 D; also in the De civili dominio i. 9 f. 20 D. Locke was very merry at sir Robert Filmer's expense for his having used the phrase 'in habit and not in act' of Adam's position as governor before there was anyone to govern: 'A very pretty way,' he says, 'of being a governor, without government, a father, without children, and a king, without subjects.'

... Adam, as soon as he was created, had a title only in habit and not in act, which, in plain English, is, he had actually no title at all.' See the first Treatise on Government iii. 18. Still Filmer's distinction is perfectly legitimate, and I only quote Locke's words in order to show that we have to accept a certain logical terminology before we can pretend to criticise a scholastic position such as Filmer's or Wycliffe's.

CHAP. X.

their tenure all alike. It is this principle of the dependence of the individual upon God and upon none else that distinguishes Wycliffe's views from any other system of the middle ages. He alone had the courage to strike at the root of priestly privilege and power by vindicating for each separate man an equal place in the eyes of God. By this formula all laymen became priests, and all priests laymen. They all 'held' of God, and on the same terms of service.

These are some of the elements of the doctrine of lordship which Wycliffe enunciates in the early chapters of his work De Dominio Divino. The rest of the treatise is principally occupied with the discussion of various questions of a strictly theological or of a metaphysical character, following upon his view of the relation of the Creator to the world, but only indirectly illustrative of that special portion of it with which we are here concerned. The practical application of the latter is found at large in the three books Of civil Lordship which fill more than a thousand pages of close and much-contracted handwriting in the only copy known to exist, a nearly contemporary manuscript now preserved in the palace library at Vienna. What is essential however for our present purpose will be found nearly complete in the first thirty-four chapters of the first book, which treat of lordship and government in themselves. This section, as the following sketch will show, indicates in its main outline Wycliffe's salient doctrine of the relation of the secular to the spiritual power; and we need not pursue its delineation further, when the author, with the exhaustive prolixity of a schoolman, defines its bearing in minute detail upon all the problems arising from this relation which called for criticism in his day.

Wycliffe begins his book by the proposition, of which CHAP. X.
the 'latter part was already noted as dangerous by Lewis 316
Gregory the Eleventh in 1377, that 'no one in mortal nr iv.
sin has any right to any gift of God, while on the other De civili dominio i. 1 f.
1 A.
hand every man standing in grace has not only a right to, but has in fact, all the gifts of God. 'He takes Ibid., f. 2 B; capp. 7, 12 ff.
16 A, 26 D.
literally the aphorism which an ancient tradition inserted in the Book of Proverbs, The faithful man hath the whole world of riches, but the unfaithful hath not even a *farthing*¹⁴; and he supports it with much fulness and ingenuity of argumentation. The first part of his thesis is indeed a legitimate following out of the doctrine which saint Augustin had enforced, of the negative character of evil. ¹⁴ Sin, he said, is nothing, and men, when v. supra,
p. 60 n. 12.
they sin, become nothing: 'if then, argued Wycliffe, sinners, Deciv. dom.
i. 1 f. 1 C.
as such, are nothing, it is evident that they can possess nothing. Moreover 'possession presupposes a right or Ibid., f.
2 C, D.
title to possess, and this right or title can only be held ultimately to depend upon the good pleasure of God, who, it is evident, cannot be thought to approve the lordship of the wicked or the manner in which they abuse their power. Again, by the common law it is not permitted to an inferior lord to alienate, in particular to mortmain, any real property without the license of his lord-in-chief, and any grant in contravention of his will is unrighteous; accordingly, inasmuch as God is the lord-in-chief of all human beings, it should appear that any grant made to a sinner must be contrary to his will, and ¹⁴ It is found in the Septuagint version at the end of Prov. xvii. 6, in the Alexandrian manuscript after ver. 4: Τοῦ πιστοῦ ὅλος ὁ κόσμος τῶν χρημάτων, τοῦ δὲ ἀπίστου οὐδὲ ὀβολός. Dr Bertheau, Die Sprüche Salomo's, intr., p. xlvii (1847) thinks the sentence possibly from the first formed part of the original book. Wycliffe knew it from Augustin, Epist. cliii. 26, Opp. 2. 534 E, and Jerom, Epist. l., Opp. 4 (2) 575, in the Benedictine editions.

CHAP. X. thus being unrighteous must be no possession in any strict or proper sense of the word. But even granting that the

* Cap. 5 f. 11 D. sinner have such possession, "all lordship of man, natural or civil, is conferred upon him by God, as the prime author, in consideration of his returning continually to God the service due unto him; but by the fact that a man by omission or commission becomes guilty of mortal sin, he defrauds his lord-in-chief of the said service, and by consequence incurs forfeiture: wherefore . . . he is rightfully to be deprived of all lordship whatsoever. How then does the wicked man come to

* Cap. 2 f. 3 D. have property in earthly things? *Wycliffe's explanation turns upon the double meaning of the word church, considered either as the holy spouse of Christ or as, in its transitory condition, the human society mixed of good and evil. To the church in its ideal signification God makes his grant; the wicked have their share only by virtue of their outward membership of it¹⁵. But since, as has been said, the sole sufficient title to any possession is the immediate grant of God, it results that such possession as the wicked have is not worthy the name of possession at all: and ^b Whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have.

^b Ibid., f. 4 A. cap. 3 f. 5 C; Matth. xxv. 29 Vulg.

By means of this and similar texts of Scripture the way is prepared for Wycliffe's second main principle; namely, that the righteous is lord of all things, or in

* Cap. 7 f. 15 D, 16 B, &c. precise terms "every righteous man is lord over the whole sensible world. If a man has anything he has everything: for, as Wycliffe says elsewhere, ^d the grant of God

^d De dom. div. iii. 2 f. 71 D.

¹⁵ Wycliffe makes a curious distinction between 'giving' and 'granting,' dare and donare; the former is a general term, the latter applies only to the righteous, or to the church. Donacio dicit gratuitam dacionem, et dacio est equivocum ad tradicionem solum ad bonum nature (aut esse primum) vel ad bonum gracie (vel perfeccionem secundam): primo modo dat deus omni inanimato vel iniusto quidquid habet; sed secundo modo dacionis, que est donacio, non dat aliquid nisi iustis: Cap. 2 f. 3 D.

is most appropriate, most ample, and most useful to the creature; CHAP. X.
 so ample indeed that ^aGod gives not any lordship to his ^aIbid.; de servants except he first give himself to them. Thus, ^feven ^{fol. 16 D.}
 when the righteous is afflicted in this life, he still has ^fIbid., f. 16 B.
 true possession of the whole universe, inasmuch as ^{all} ^{8 Rom. viii.} things work together for good to him, in assisting him to- ^{28.} wards eternal happiness. It would be impossible to indicate the spiritual nature of the lordship claimed by Wycliffe for the righteous, more distinctly than by this example: yet he proceeds to dwell upon its literal truth in a way that might almost persuade us that he is really developing a system of polity applicable to the existing conditions of life. He is not afraid to pursue his doctrine to the logical conclusion that, ^has they are ^hDeciv. dom.
 many righteous and each is lord of the universe, all ^{i. 14 f. 32 C.} goods must necessarily be held in common¹⁶. He ex-pounds the rules of charity laid down by saint Paul (charity with Wycliffe is the correlative term to grace), and interprets the sentence, ¹Charity seeketh not her own—¹1 Cor. xiii. 5.
^kseeketh not to be a proprietor but to have all things in ^kDeciv. dom.
 common. Any objections to the doctrine he dismisses ^{i. 15 f. 35 A, B.} as ^lsophistical. ^mThose adduced by Aristotle hold, he ^lCap. 14 f. 32 C. says, only in regard to the community of wives proposed ^mIbid., ff.
 by Plato; but this application may be proved to be ^{32 B-33 A.} logically fallacious.

Such are in brief the fundamental principles of the treatise Of civil Lordship: the righteous has all things;
 the wicked has nothing, ⁿonly occupies for the time ⁿCap. 5 that which he has unrighteously usurped or stolen from ^{ff. 10 D, 11 A.} the righteous. Lordship, in a word is founded in grace;

¹⁶ Omnis homo debet esse in gracia, et si est in gracia est dominus universitatis; ergo omnis homo debet esse dominus universitatis:

quod non staret cum multitudine hominum, nisi omnes illi deberent habere omnia in communi; ergo omnia debent esse communia.

CHAP. X.

and grace, or, from another point of view, the law of the Gospel, being alone essential to it, it follows necessarily that °human ordinances are accidental or indifferent. The latter, Wycliffe maintains, are in fact °the mere consequence of the fall of man: they originate in sin, in the lust of lordship; and for the most part they betray their origin evidently enough by °the opportunities they offer for wrong-doing and tyranny. When therefore we require, in addition to the natural lordship which is that of the Gospel, °an inferior sort of lordship, civil lordship, the latter, it is clear, must not pretend to any absolute or essential character; it is transitory and liable to modification according to the changing conditions of human society; above all it is entirely subordinate to that natural lordship °from which it draws whatever claim it may have to righteousness¹⁷. Accordingly, saving this one grand principle, Wycliffe does not care to lay down any fixed rules as to the best form of government. Like °Ockham, he feels too deeply the necessary infirmity of all human institutions to be able to dogmatise about their relative excellence. °Suppose, he says, the whole people desire a certain man to be their civil ruler, it does not follow on that account that he is rightly their ruler; nor can any human laws touching hereditary succession or the conveyance of property make such succession or transfer righteous or true, unless they are conformable to the law of nature¹⁸.

¹⁷ Wycliffe thus states the distinction between natural and civil lordship: Dominium quidem naturale est dominium divinitus institutum, in primo titulo iusticie fundatum, quotlibet divites ex equo compaciens, sed alienacionem dominantis [cod. dominanter], servata iusticia, non permittens: dominium

autem civile est dominium occasione peccati humanitus institutum, incommunicabile singulis et, ex equo, multis dominis, sed abdicabile servata iusticia: Cap. 18 f. 40 D.

¹⁸ Nam non sequitur, 'Totus populus vult Petrum dominari civiliter; ergo iuste:' ymmo primus consensus populi ad aliquem civili-

° Capp. 17, 34 ff. 38 C-40 C. 80 C, D.

° Capp. 18, 21 ff. 41 B, 49 C.

° Cap. 18 f. 42 B, C.

° Ibid., ff. 41 B-42 A.

° Capp. 5, 19 ff. 12 B, 43 A, B.

° Cf. supra, pp. 277 sqq.

° Deciv. dom. l. 18 f. 42 B.

The law of nature in Wycliffe's mouth is something far different from that of which other schoolmen found the exposition in the Politics of Aristotle. He adopts in fact the point of view of the strict hierarchical advocates, only with the all-important difference that his lawgiver is not the church but the Bible itself. CHAP. X.

There is therefore a lack of decision about Wycliffe's treatment of the different methods according to which a society may be governed. In the abstract ¹he thinks ²that an aristocracy, by which he understands the rule of judges in the Old Testament sense, must surpass any other constitution, because it is the least connected with civil ordinances. He applies the example of the Israelite history, according to which, he says, judges were first set by God over his people and monarchy was a sign of their defection from the divine rule; finally, he adds, they came under the worst sort of rule, that of priests, which was most of all vitiated by human tradition and indeed altogether corrupt. Balancing the two former modes of government, ³Wycliffe appears to feel that, granted the sinful state of mankind, government by a single ruler is on the whole the most beneficial, since it is the strongest to restrain their excesses. ⁴He goes on to enquire whether lordship should be transmitted by hereditary succession or whether a fresh choice should take place at every vacancy. On the one hand it may be urged that the security of tenure possessed by an hereditary monarch, and the certainty he has of handing down his lordship to his son, is an

¹ Cap. 27
ff. 62 D-64 A.

² Ibid.,
f. 65 A, B;
cap. 28 f. 67 C.

³ Cap. 29
ff. 67 C-69 D.

ter dominandum, qui tamen fuit a peccato purior, non fuit iustus nisi presupposita ratione, scilicet quod persona dominans sit a deo accepta ad illud officium; et per idem nulla

principia iuris civilis de successione hereditaria vel commutatione mutua terrenorum est iusta vel vera, nisi de quanto est legis nature particula: ibid., f. 42 B.

CHAP. X. inducement to him to play the tyrant; on the other hand this very fact may increase his care for his dominion and cause him to make the best use of it. It is here assumed, as regularly in the middle ages, that a prince whom the community has elected, it may depose; while an hereditary monarch, according to the common belief, could not be legally deprived of his power. Again, in favour of the elective principle, ^ait may be said that an election in which all qualified persons take part must be right. But Wycliffe, as we have seen, has no opinion of the value of the popular vote: *since the fall of man, he says, it generally happens that the electing community is, altogether or in its greater part, infected by crime; and thus it happens that it is at fault in elections, even as in other acts alike concerning God and the commonwealth*¹⁹. Wycliffe argues at length on both sides; incidently he discloses a good deal of political acuteness, and ^bhe leans towards a preference for the hereditary principle: but no experience or historical observation will induce him to forego the application here also of his first doctrine; and thus ^che decides that neither heredity nor election furnishes any title sufficient for the foundation of human lordship, without the anterior condition of grace in the person so elected or so succeeding. ^d*Wherefore it appears to me that the discreet theologian will determine nothing rashly as touching these laws, but will affirm according to law that it were better that all things should be had in common.*

But lordship, as was stated at the outset, has another

¹⁹ The only concession he makes is as follows: Non est possibile communitatem in eleccione deficere, nisi peccatum pertinens sit in causa; deus enim non potest deficere ab instinctu regitivo populi secundum sibi utilius, cum hoc quod populus utrobique deo faciat quidquid debet: f. 69 c. But it will be seen that the qualification repeated in this sentence deprives it of most of its value.

^a Cap. 29
f. 68 c, d.

^b Cap. 30
f. 70 B, C.

^c Ibid.,
f. 69 D; cf.
cap. 29
sub fin.

^d Cap. 30
f. 71 C.

aspect to it; *the theory of the community of lordship in itself involves its counterpart, the community of service. In this we find the only check recognised by Wycliffe, upon the action of kings: they have a responsibility, not,—we may infer from the tenour of his argument,—to the people over whom they rule, but to God from whom they derive their lordship. †They are his stewards, and lords only by virtue of service. God is the only lord whose dominion is unattended by this condition; all other lords are servants not only of God but also of all their fellow-men. ‡The superscription of papal letters, servus servorum, acknowledges this truth in the most exalted of ecclesiastical potentates: ^hit has the authority of the apostle who bade the Galatians, ⁱBy love serve one another. We have seen the corollary of this principle; since all are lords and all servants one of another, then, all things, all that we call property, must belong in common to all. But if we are startled by the premature socialism of the thesis, we have to bear in mind that Wycliffe had yet to learn its effects in practical life, as displayed in the excesses of the rebels of 1381. Such application indeed was never in his mind; nor did he ever pass a word which could be interpreted into approval of a violent assertion of those rights which notwithstanding he fully conceded. All things were all men's, but so long as the present state of polity subsisted it was unlawful to acquire them by force: for on the one hand the human constitution of society had the divine sanction, although it were imperfect by comparison with its eternal or evangelical ordering; and on the other hand force was incompatible with the primary dictates of the law of God.

Wycliffe's communism is thus expressly limited to a

CHAP. X.

* Cap. 11 f. 24 C, D; cf. cap. 32 f. 76 A.

† Cap. 19 f. 43 C, D.

‡ Cap. 11, 14 ff. 24 D, 32 D.

^h Cap. 11 f. 26 A.

ⁱ Gal. v. 13.

CHAP. X. condition of the world not present, but to be looked for and worked for: nor only thus; it is also limited to a field of possession other than that of human or temporal acquirement. ^k Earthly loss is heavenly gain, and the care of earthly things is a barrier to our love of those which are our proper objects. ^l If we seek the shadow we shall fail of the substance, but if we press forward to the substance the shadow will follow and attend us too. The righteous therefore has all things, not necessarily, not principally, in this present life; but as his right now, and as his sure and indefeasible enjoyment hereafter. His lordship, being founded in grace, has the warrant of God's decree: the fruition of it may be delayed, so far as earthly goods are concerned, but possession of all things remains his inalienable right. The sinner on the contrary by the very fact of sinning loses all right to anything. His lordship is no longer founded in grace, it has no substantial existence; it may seem to stand for a time, but he reaps his good on this earth only to be one day terribly recompensed.

This opposition between the righteous who have all things and the unrighteous who have nothing, runs through all Wycliffe's argument on the question of lordship. In it he finds the secret of the differences of human lot; by its means he is able to reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the troubles and disappointments of the good. He translates the Bible into the language of feudalism, and then having satisfied himself that Christianity and lordship are convertible terms, he proceeds to explain his new-found polity on a strictly spiritual basis. But however ideal the principle on which Wycliffe goes, it has none the less a very plain meaning when applied to the circumstances of the religious organism in the writer's own time. For the essence of the whole conception lies in the stress which he laid upon inner, as opposed to outer, elements as those which determine a man's proper merit. To Wycliffe it was the personal relation, the immediate dependence of the individual upon God, that made him worthy or unworthy; it was his own character and not his office, however exalted in the eyes of men, that constituted him what he really was. The pope himself, if unworthy, if personally a bad man, lost ipso facto his entire right to lordship.

^k Cap. 9, 16 ff. 19 D, 20 A, 37 A, B, & C.

^l Cap. 12 f. 27 A-C.

Here however, as so often in Wycliffe, an important distinction has to be settled. Every good man, we have seen before, is lord of all things, but he is not on that account at liberty to assert his possession of them in contravention of civil right: so also ^m he cannot claim to disobey the civil ruler because that ruler is personally unworthy of his post; his rule is at least permitted by God. Thus Wycliffe expressly repudiates the inference which might naturally and logically be drawn from his premises. God, ran his famous paradox, *ought to obey the devil*²⁰; that is, no one can escape from the duty of obedience to existing powers, be those powers never so depraved²¹. But there is logic also in Wycliffe's position. As things are, he felt, the spheres of

^m cf. Shirley, intr., pp. lxxiii-lxxv.

²⁰ This appears first in the later list of Wycliffe's errors, 1382: Lewis 358 nr vii, Shirley 278, 494. But it is perfectly in keeping with his earlier doctrine.

²¹ Wycliffe has a chapter in the De civili dominio, i. 28, in which he discusses, and decides in the affirmative sense, the duty of obedience to tyrants. Hic dicetur quod dupliciter contingit iuste obedire mundi potentibus: vel pure paci-

endo, servata caritate, quod non poterit esse malum; vel active ministrando in bonis fortune aut ministerio corporali, quod indubie, servata de possibili caritate, foret bonum. Yet, he hints, a Christian, 'si esset verisimile homini per subtractionem temporalis iuvaminis destruere potentatus tyrannidem vel abusum, debet ea intencione subtrahere:' f. 66 A, B.

CHAP. X.

and grace, or, from another point of view, the law of the Gospel, being alone essential to it, it follows necessarily that °human ordinances are accidental or indifferent. The latter, Wycliffe maintains, are in fact °the mere consequence of the fall of man: they originate in sin, in the lust of lordship; and for the most part they betray their origin evidently enough by °the opportunities they offer for wrong-doing and tyranny. When therefore we require, in addition to the natural lordship which is that of the Gospel, °an inferior sort of lordship, civil lordship, the latter, it is clear, must not pretend to any absolute or essential character; it is transitory and liable to modification according to the changing conditions of human society; above all it is entirely subordinate to that natural lordship °from which it draws whatever claim it may have to righteousness¹⁷. Accordingly, saving this one grand principle, Wycliffe does not care to lay down any fixed rules as to the best form of government. Like °Ockham, he feels too deeply the necessary infirmity of all human institutions to be able to dogmatise about their relative excellence. °Suppose, he says, the whole people desire a certain man to be their civil ruler, it does not follow on that account that he is rightly their ruler; nor can any human laws touching hereditary succession or the conveyance of property make such succession or transfer righteous or true, unless they are conformable to the law of nature¹⁸.

° Capp. 17, 34
ff. 38 C-40 C.
80 C, D.

° Capp. 18,
21 ff. 41 B,
49 C.

° Cap. 18
f. 42 B, C.

° Ibid., ff. 41 B-42 A.

° Capp. 5, 19
ff. 12 B,
43 A, B.

° Cf. supra,
pp. 277 sqq.

° Deciv. dom.
i. 18 f. 42 B.

¹⁷ Wycliffe thus states the distinction between natural and civil lordship: Dominium quidem naturale est dominium divinitus institutum, in primo titulo iusticie fundatum, quotlibet divites ex equo compaciens, sed alienacionem dominantis [cod. dominanter], servata iusticia, non permittens: dominium

autem civile est dominium occasione peccati humanitus institutum, incommunicabile singulis et, ex equo, multis dominis, sed abdicabile servata iusticia: Cap. 18 f. 40 D.

¹⁸ Nam non sequitur, 'Totus populus vult Petrum dominari civiliter; ergo iuste:' ymmo primus consensus populi ad aliquem civili-

The law of nature in Wycliffe's mouth is something far different from that of which other schoolmen found the exposition in the Politics of Aristotle. He adopts in fact the point of view of the strict hierarchical advocates, only with the all-important difference that his lawgiver is not the church but the Bible itself. CHAP. X.

There is therefore a lack of decision about Wycliffe's treatment of the different methods according to which a society may be governed. In the abstract ² he thinks ³ that an aristocracy, by which he understands the rule of judges in the Old Testament sense, must surpass any other constitution, because it is the least connected with civil ordinances. He applies the example of the Israelite history, according to which, he says, judges were first set by God over his people and monarchy was a sign of their defection from the divine rule; finally, he adds, they came under the worst sort of rule, that of priests, which was most of all vitiated by human tradition and indeed altogether corrupt. Balancing the two former modes of government, ⁴ Wycliffe appears to feel that, granted the sinful state of mankind, government by a single ruler is on the whole the most beneficial, since it is the strongest to restrain their excesses. ⁵ He goes on to enquire whether lordship should be transmitted by hereditary succession or whether a fresh choice should take place at every vacancy. On the one hand it may be urged that the security of tenure possessed by an hereditary monarch, and the certainty he has of handing down his lordship to his son, is an

² Cap. 27
ff. 62 D-64 A.

³ Ibid.,
f. 65 A, B;
cap. 28 f. 67 C.

⁴ Cap. 29
ff. 67 C-69 D.

ter dominandum, qui tamen fuit a peccato purior, non fuit iustus nisi presupposita ratione, scilicet quod persona dominans sit a deo accepta ad illud officium; et per idem nulla

principia iuris civilis de successione hereditaria vel commutatione mutua terrenorum est iusta vel vera, nisi de quanto est legis nature particula: ibid., f. 42 B.

CHAP. X. inducement to him to play the tyrant; on the other hand this very fact may increase his care for his dominion and cause him to make the best use of it. It is here assumed, as regularly in the middle ages, that a prince whom the community has elected, it may depose; while an hereditary monarch, according to the common belief, could not be legally deprived of his power. Again, in favour of the elective principle, ^ait may be said that an election in which all qualified persons take part must be right. But Wycliffe, as we have seen, has no opinion of the value of the popular vote: *since the fall of man, he says, it generally happens that the electing community is, altogether or in its greater part, infected by crime; and thus it happens that it is at fault in elections, even as in other acts alike concerning God and the commonwealth*¹⁹. Wycliffe argues at length on both sides; incidently he discloses a good deal of political acuteness, and ^bhe leans towards a preference for the hereditary principle: but no experience or historical observation will induce him to forego the application here also of his first doctrine; and thus ^che decides that neither heredity nor election furnishes any title sufficient for the foundation of human lordship, without the anterior condition of grace in the person so elected or so succeeding. ^d*Wherefore it appears to me that the discreet theologian will determine nothing rashly as touching these laws, but will affirm according to law that it were better that all things should be had in common.*

But lordship, as was stated at the outset, has another

¹⁹ The only concession he makes is as follows: Non est possibile communitatem in eleccione deficere, nisi peccatum pertinens sit in causa; deus enim non potest deficere ab instinctu regitivo populi secundum

sibi utilius, cum hoc quod populus utrobique deo faciat quidquid debet: f. 69 c. But it will be seen that the qualification repeated in this sentence deprives it of most of its value.

^a Cap. 29 f. 68 c, d.

^b Cap. 30 f. 70 B, C.

^c Ibid., f. 69 D; cf. cap. 29 sub fin.

^d Cap. 30 f. 71 c.

aspect to it; *the theory of the community of lordship in itself involves its counterpart, the community of service. In this we find the only check recognised by Wycliffe, upon the action of kings: they have a responsibility, not,—we may infer from the tenour of his argument,—to the people over whom they rule, but to God from whom they derive their lordship. †They are his stewards, and lords only by virtue of service. God is the only lord whose dominion is unattended by this condition; all other lords are servants not only of God but also of all their fellow-men. ‡The superscription of papal letters, servus servorum, acknowledges this truth in the most exalted of ecclesiastical potentates: ^hit has the authority of the apostle who bade the Galatians, ⁱBy love serve one another. We have seen the corollary of this principle; since all are lords and all servants one of another, then, all things, all that we call property, must belong in common to all. But if we are startled by the premature socialism of the thesis, we have to bear in mind that Wycliffe had yet to learn its effects in practical life, as displayed in the excesses of the rebels of 1381. Such application indeed was never in his mind; nor did he ever pass a word which could be interpreted into approval of a violent assertion of those rights which notwithstanding he fully conceded. All things were all men's, but so long as the present state of polity subsisted it was unlawful to acquire them by force: for on the one hand the human constitution of society had the divine sanction, although it were imperfect by comparison with its eternal or evangelical ordering; and on the other hand force was incompatible with the primary dictates of the law of God.

Wycliffe's communism is thus expressly limited to a

CHAP. X.

* Cap. 11 f. 24 C, D; cf. cap. 32 f. 76 A.

† Cap. 19 f. 43 C, D.

‡ Capp. 11, 14 ff. 24 D, 32 D.

^h Cap. 11 f. 26 A.

ⁱ Gal. v. 13.

CHAP. X. condition of the world not present, but to be looked for and worked for: nor only thus; it is also limited to a field of possession other than that of human or temporal acquirement. ^k Earthly loss is heavenly gain, and the care of earthly things is a barrier to our love of those which are our proper objects. ^l If we seek the shadow we shall fail of the substance, but if we press forward to the substance the shadow will follow and attend us too. The righteous therefore has all things, not necessarily, not principally, in this present life; but as his right now, and as his sure and indefeasible enjoyment hereafter. His lordship, being founded in grace, has the warrant of God's decree: the fruition of it may be delayed, so far as earthly goods are concerned, but possession of all things remains his inalienable right. The sinner on the contrary by the very fact of sinning loses all right to anything. His lordship is no longer founded in grace, it has no substantial existence; it may seem to stand for a time, but he reaps his good on this earth only to be one day terribly recompensed.

This opposition between the righteous who have all things and the unrighteous who have nothing, runs through all Wycliffe's argument on the question of lordship. In it he finds the secret of the differences of human lot; by its means he is able to reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the troubles and disappointments of the good. He translates the Bible into the language of feudalism, and then having satisfied himself that Christianity and lordship are convertible terms, he proceeds to explain his new-found polity on a strictly spiritual basis. But however ideal the principle on which Wycliffe goes, it has none the less a very plain meaning when applied to the circumstances of the religious organism in the writer's own time. For the essence of the whole conception lies in the stress which he laid upon inner, as opposed to outer, elements as those which determine a man's proper merit. To Wycliffe it was the personal relation, the immediate dependence of the individual upon God, that made him worthy or unworthy; it was his own character and not his office, however exalted in the eyes of men, that constituted him what he really was. The pope himself, if unworthy, if personally a bad man, lost ipso facto his entire right to lordship.

^k Cap. 9, 16 ff. 19 D, 20 A, 37 A, B, & C.

^l Cap. 12 f. 27 A-C.

CHAP. X.

Here however, as so often in Wycliffe, an important distinction has to be settled. Every good man, we have seen before, is lord of all things, but he is not on that account at liberty to assert his possession of them in contravention of civil right: so also ^mhe cannot claim to disobey the civil ruler because that ruler is personally unworthy of his post; his rule is at least permitted by God. Thus Wycliffe expressly repudiates the inference which might naturally and logically be drawn from his premises. God, ran his famous paradox, *ought to obey the devil*²⁰; that is, no one can escape from the duty of obedience to existing powers, be those powers never so depraved²¹. But there is logic also in Wycliffe's position. As things are, he felt, the spheres of

^m cf. Shirley,
intr., pp.
lxiii-lxv.

²⁰ This appears first in the later list of Wycliffe's errors, 1382: Lewis 358 nr vii, Shirley 278, 494. But it is perfectly in keeping with his earlier doctrine.

²¹ Wycliffe has a chapter in the De civili dominio, i. 28, in which he discusses, and decides in the affirmative sense, the duty of obedience to tyrants. Hic dicetur quod dupliciter contingit iuste obedire mundi potentibus: vel pure paci-

endo, servata caritate, quod non poterit esse malum; vel active ministrando in bonis fortune aut ministerio corporali, quod indubie, servata de possibili caritate, foret bonum. Yet, he hints, a Christian, 'si esset verisimile homini per subtractionem temporalis iuvaminis destruere potentatus tyrannidem vel abusum, debet ea intencione subtrahere:' f. 66 A, B.

CHAP. X. spiritual and temporal sovereignty are kept asunder. The spiritual authority has no competence to interfere with the temporal, nor the temporal with the spiritual. Each is paramount within its own area of jurisdiction, so far as the present state of affairs is concerned; but in the eternal order of the universe right, power, lordship, and the practical exercise of authority, are dependent on the character, the righteousness, of the person to whom they belong.

It is Wycliffe's veneration for the spiritual dignity of the church that led him to sever its sphere of action from that of the world. No pope or priest of the church, he held, could claim any temporal authority: ^a*he is a lord, yea even a king*, but only in things spiritual. So far as the pope, to take the salient instance, recedes from this position, so far as he holds any earthly power, so far is he unworthy of his office. ^o*For to rule temporal possessions after a civil manner, to conquer kingdoms, and exact tributes, appertain to earthly lordship, not to the pope; so that if he pass by and set aside the office of spiritual rule, and entangle himself in those other concerns, his work is not only superfluous but also contrary to holy Scripture.* It would however be a signal mistake to regard Wycliffe's intention here as directed in any sense to the overthrow of the papacy. He has not only a clear perception of, a firm belief in, the supremacy of the spiritual chief of the church; he goes so far as to assert that ^p*no one can have even the goodwill of his fellow-men, amicitia*, except by grant of the pope, ratifying the grant of God. This dignity, he feels, is in truth incompatible with the business of the external world: he would free it from those impediments.

In such an endeavour Wycliffe had forerunners in ^a Deciv.dom.

i. 11 f. 24 A.

^o Cap. 17
f. 40 C.

^p Cap. 13
f. 30 A.

several of the controversial writers with whom we have been occupied in the preceding chapter. There was nothing new in his argument on this head, save only the way in which he fitted it into his framework of lordship. The pope, he explained, is indeed lord; all men are lords: but just by virtue of mutual service. If any one should seek to raise himself above service, to make himself lord absolute, he becomes by this very act all the more a servant, all the less a lord. This paradoxical position is protected by the altogether ideal character of the scheme. To resume for a moment his salient conception, Wycliffe tries to withdraw himself from the thought of any civil polity; he insists that ^a the law of the gospel is sufficient by itself, without the civil law or that called canonical (the qualification is noteworthy), for the perfect rule of the church militant; human laws and ordinances, he considers but the consequence of the fall of man. He looks forward to a state of things in which it will be possible to dispense with everything but the divine and eternal law: he has not, as ^r Thomas Aquinas ^{v. supra, p. 244.} had, the philosopher's insight which could recognise a human law as something inextricably involved in the existence of an human society.

It was therefore when the power of the spiritual and temporal lord crossed one another that Wycliffe's strict principle came into play. When the church exercised functions which justly belonged to the state, when it became involved in transactions about money and territorial possession, then, he held, it was time for the state to interfere and vindicate its right over its own affairs. The mis-used revenues of the church were to be won back and the spirituality was to be limited to its proper spiritual office. Such at the date of Wycliffe's history

CHAP. X.

CHAP. X.

to which alone our attention is directed, was the main result to which his theorising had led him²². But it is evident that the principle on which he built could not fail to bring with it other no less practical conclusions. By means of his doctrine of lordship he not only undermined the fabric of the hierarchy, since each individual is answerable to God alone, but also was already moved to question, with Ockham, whether the pope be an indispensable element in the fabric²³; he even speculates whether it be not possible that one day the ship of Peter, the church, may not consist exclusively of laymen²⁴. Another step, such a step as was suggested by the schism of 1378, would lead Wycliffe into fixed opposition to the papacy. At present he is still animated by a loyal reverence towards the head of the church: he only disputes the pope's pretensions when they exceed the sphere of his true functions as such; he only discusses in a theoretical way the abstract necessity rather than the expediency of the existing order of things.

The ultimate form which Wycliffe's teaching assumed is a commonplace of religious history. We have here restricted our consideration of it to a time when it might still be regarded as a genuine product of catholic thought. Like the ferment of questions which filled the ²² Cf. de civ. dom. ii. 12 f. 198 A, B: Domini temporales possunt legitime ac meritorie auferre divicias a quocunque clerico habitualiter abutente; or in larger terms, f. 198 C: Domini temporales habent potestatem ad auferendas divicias legitime ac meritorie etiam a tota ecclesia possessionatorum in casu quo eis habitualiter abutatur.

²³ Caput Christus cum sua lege est per se sufficiens ad regulam sponse sue; ergo nullus alius homo requiritur tamquam sponsus. . . . Sufficit enim modo, sicut sufficit in primitiva ecclesia quod Christianus sit in gracia, credendo in Christum, licet nullum aliud caput ecclesie ipsum direxerit: Lib. i. 43 f. 123 C.

²⁴ Navicula quidem Petri est ecclesia militans. . . . Nec video quin dicta navis Petri possit pure per tempus stare in laycis. Ideo nimis sophisticant qui triplicant templum domini, et referunt navem Petri tamquam ad per se causam originalem, id est, ad istam Romanam ecclesiam vel quamcunque particularem citra Christum: ibid., f. 127 C.

deliberations of the councils of Constance and Basle half a century later, they are still charged with the spirit of the middle ages. Like those debates they point forward also to an age that is yet to come. The full solution of the political problems of the church was left for the more strenuous struggle of the sixteenth century; but if Wycliffe's later career made him in spirit the precursor of the protestant reformation, he had already found out for himself the great secret of modern belief, a principle far more important than any of the special doctrinal details which afterwards roused his antagonism. He has not indeed the credit of having discovered the peculiar formula of 'justification by faith,' which to superficial readers appears to constitute the kernel of reformation-teaching, but he has dared to codify the laws which govern the moral world on the basis of the direct dependence of the individual man on God²⁵. In using the word individual we are indeed departing from the strict meaning of Wycliffe's words, and introducing an apparent contradiction to that doctrine of community which lies at the root of his exposition. Such is however the purport of his language, as we should now understand it: to Wycliffe himself the individual Christian was nothing save by virtue of his membership of the Christian body; but since he divorced the idea of the church from any necessary connexion with its official establishment and left it purely spiritual, to say that a man's relation to God is determined by his union dum ecclesiam: ibid., f. 123 R, c. Cf. f. 122 D: Quecunque ergo persona fidelis ecclesie, laycus vel clericus, Latinus vel Grecus, masculus vel femella, sufficit ad fidem instrumentaliter ac occasionaliter gignendam. The entire argument of the chapter is highly instructive.

²⁵ Deus . . . dat sua carismata cui-libet Christiano, constituens cum eo, tamquam membro suo, unum corpus mysticum; ad nullam talem influenciam requiritur persona hominis disparata; ergo nulla persona Romane ecclesie requiritur tamquam medium absolute necessarium ad regulan-

CHAP. X.

^o Capp. 17, 34
ff. 38 C-40 C.
80 C, D.

^p Capp. 18,
21 ff. 41 B,
49 C.

^q Cap. 18
f. 42 B, C.

^r Ibid.,
ff. 41 B-42 A.

^s Capp. 5, 19
ff. 12 B,
43 A, B.

^t Cf. supra,
pp. 277 sqq.

^u De civ. dom.
i. 18 f. 42 B.

and grace, or, from another point of view, the law of the Gospel, being alone essential to it, it follows necessarily that ^ohuman ordinances are accidental or indifferent. The latter, Wycliffe maintains, are in fact ^pthe mere consequence of the fall of man: they originate in sin, in the lust of lordship; and for the most part they betray their origin evidently enough by ^qthe opportunities they offer for wrong-doing and tyranny. When therefore we require, in addition to the natural lordship which is that of the Gospel, ^ran inferior sort of lordship, civil lordship, the latter, it is clear, must not pretend to any absolute or essential character; it is transitory and liable to modification according to the changing conditions of human society; above all it is entirely subordinate to that natural lordship ^sfrom which it draws whatever claim it may have to righteousness¹⁷. Accordingly, saving this one grand principle, Wycliffe does not care to lay down any fixed rules as to the best form of government. Like ^tOckham, he feels too deeply the necessary infirmity of all human institutions to be able to dogmatise about their relative excellence. ^uSuppose, he says, the whole people desire a certain man to be their civil ruler, it does not follow on that account that he is rightly their ruler; nor can any human laws touching hereditary succession or the conveyance of property make such succession or transfer righteous or true, unless they are conformable to the law of nature¹⁸.

¹⁷ Wycliffe thus states the distinction between natural and civil lordship: Dominium quidem naturale est dominium divinitus institutum, in primo titulo iusticie fundatum, quotlibet divites ex equo compaciens, sed alienacionem dominantis [cod. dominanter], servata iusticia, non permittens: dominium

autem civile est dominium occasione peccati humanitus institutum, incommunicabile singulis et, ex equo, multis dominis, sed abdicabile servata iusticia: Cap. 18 f. 40 D.

¹⁸ Nam non sequitur, 'Totus populus vult Petrum dominari civiliter; ergo iuste:' ymmo primus consensus populi ad aliquem civili-

The law of nature in Wycliffe's mouth is something far different from that of which other schoolmen found the exposition in the Politics of Aristotle. He adopts in fact the point of view of the strict hierarchical advocates, only with the all-important difference that his lawgiver is not the church but the Bible itself. CHAP. X.

There is therefore a lack of decision about Wycliffe's treatment of the different methods according to which a society may be governed. In the abstract ²he thinks ³that an aristocracy, by which he understands the rule of judges in the Old Testament sense, must surpass any other constitution, because it is the least connected with civil ordinances. He applies the example of the Israelite history, according to which, he says, judges were first set by God over his people and monarchy was a sign of their defection from the divine rule; finally, he adds, they came under the worst sort of rule, that of priests, which was most of all vitiated by human tradition and indeed altogether corrupt. Balancing the two former modes of government, ⁴Wycliffe appears to feel that, granted the sinful state of mankind, government by a single ruler is on the whole the most beneficial, since it is the strongest to restrain their excesses. ⁵He goes on to enquire whether lordship should be transmitted by hereditary succession or whether a fresh choice should take place at every vacancy. On the one hand it may be urged that the security of tenure possessed by an hereditary monarch, and the certainty he has of handing down his lordship to his son, is an

² Cap. 27
ff. 62 D-64 A.

³ Ibid.,
f. 65 A, B;
cap. 28 f. 67 c.

⁴ Cap. 29
ff. 67 c-69 D.

ter dominandum, qui tamen fuit a peccato purior, non fuit iustus nisi presupposita ratione, scilicet quod persona dominans sit a deo accepta ad illud officium; et per idem nulla

principia iuris civilis de successione hereditaria vel commutatione mutua terrenorum est iusta vel vera, nisi de quanto est legis nature particula: ibid., f. 42 B.

CHAP. X. inducement to him to play the tyrant; on the other hand this very fact may increase his care for his dominion and cause him to make the best use of it. It is here assumed, as regularly in the middle ages, that a prince whom the community has elected, it may depose; while an hereditary monarch, according to the common belief, could not be legally deprived of his power. Again, in favour of the elective principle, ^ait may be said that an election in which all qualified persons take part must be right. But Wycliffe, as we have seen, has no opinion of the value of the popular vote: *since the fall of man, he says, it generally happens that the electing community is, altogether or in its greater part, infected by crime; and thus it happens that it is at fault in elections, even as in other acts alike concerning God and the commonwealth*¹⁹. Wycliffe argues at length on both sides; incidently he discloses a good deal of political acuteness, and ^bhe leans towards a preference for the hereditary principle: but no experience or historical observation will induce him to forego the application here also of his first doctrine; and thus ^che decides that neither heredity nor election furnishes any title sufficient for the foundation of human lordship, without the anterior condition of grace in the person so elected or so succeeding. ^d*Wherefore it appears to me that the discreet theologian will determine nothing rashly as touching these laws, but will affirm according to law that it were better that all things should be had in common.*

But lordship, as was stated at the outset, has another

¹⁹ The only concession he makes is as follows: Non est possibile communitatem in eleccione deficere, nisi peccatum pertinens sit in causa; deus enim non potest deficere ab instinctu regitivo populi secundum sibi utilius, cum hoc quod populus utrobique deo faciat quidquid debet: f. 69 c. But it will be seen that the qualification repeated in this sentence deprives it of most of its value.

^a Cap. 29
f. 68 C, D.

^b Cap. 30
f. 70 B, C.

^c Ibid.,
f. 69 D; cf.
cap. 29
sub fin.

^d Cap. 30
f. 71 C.

aspect to it; *the theory of the community of lordship in itself involves its counterpart, the community of service. In this we find the only check recognised by Wycliffe, upon the action of kings: they have a responsibility, not,—we may infer from the tenour of his argument,—to the people over whom they rule, but to God from whom they derive their lordship. †They are his stewards, and lords only by virtue of service. God is the only lord whose dominion is unattended by this condition; all other lords are servants not only of God but also of all their fellow-men. ‡The superscription of papal letters, servus servorum, acknowledges this truth in the most exalted of ecclesiastical potentates: ^h it has the authority of the apostle who bade the Galatians, ⁱ By love serve one another. We have seen the corollary of this principle; since all are lords and all servants one of another, then, all things, all that we call property, must belong in common to all. But if we are startled by the premature socialism of the thesis, we have to bear in mind that Wycliffe had yet to learn its effects in practical life, as displayed in the excesses of the rebels of 1381. Such application indeed was never in his mind; nor did he ever pass a word which could be interpreted into approval of a violent assertion of those rights which notwithstanding he fully conceded. All things were all men's, but so long as the present state of polity subsisted it was unlawful to acquire them by force: for on the one hand the human constitution of society had the divine sanction, although it were imperfect by comparison with its eternal or evangelical ordering; and on the other hand force was incompatible with the primary dictates of the law of God.

Wycliffe's communism is thus expressly limited to a

CHAP. X.

* Cap. 11 f. 24 C, D; cf. cap. 32 f. 76 A.

† Cap. 19 f. 43 C, D.

‡ Capp. 11, 14 ff. 24 D, 32 D.

^h Cap. 11 f. 26 A.

ⁱ Gal. v. 13.

CHAP. X.

condition of the world not present, but to be looked for and worked for : nor only thus ; it is also limited to a field of possession other than that of human or temporal acquirement. ² Earthly loss is heavenly gain, and the care of earthly things is a barrier to our love of those which are our proper objects. ¹ If we seek the shadow we shall fail of the substance, but if we press forward to the substance the shadow will follow and attend us too. The righteous therefore has all things, not necessarily, not principally, in this present life ; but as his right now, and as his sure and indefeasible enjoyment hereafter. His lordship, being founded in grace, has the warrant of God's decree : the fruition of it may be delayed, so far as earthly goods are concerned, but possession of all things remains his inalienable right. The sinner on the contrary by the very fact of sinning loses all right to anything. His lordship is no longer founded in grace, it has no substantial existence ; it may seem to stand for a time, but he reaps his good on this earth only to be one day terribly recompensed.

This opposition between the righteous who have all things and the unrighteous who have nothing, runs through all Wycliffe's argument on the question of lordship. In it he finds the secret of the differences of human lot ; by its means he is able to reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the troubles and disappointments of the good. He translates the Bible into the language of feudalism, and then having satisfied himself that Christianity and lordship are convertible terms, he proceeds to explain his new-found polity on a strictly spiritual basis. But however ideal the principle on which Wycliffe goes, it has none the less a very plain meaning when applied to the circumstances of

² Cap. 9, 16
ff. 19 D, 20 A,
37 A, B, &c.

¹ Cap. 12 f.
27 A-C.

the religious organism in the writer's own time. For the essence of the whole conception lies in the stress which he laid upon inner, as opposed to outer, elements as those which determine a man's proper merit. To Wycliffe it was the personal relation, the immediate dependence of the individual upon God, that made him worthy or unworthy; it was his own character and not his office, however exalted in the eyes of men, that constituted him what he really was. The pope himself, if unworthy, if personally a bad man, lost ipso facto his entire right to lordship.

Here however, as so often in Wycliffe, an important distinction has to be settled. Every good man, we have seen before, is lord of all things, but he is not on that account at liberty to assert his possession of them in contravention of civil right: so also ^mhe cannot claim to disobey the civil ruler because that ruler is personally unworthy of his post; his rule is at least permitted by God. Thus Wycliffe expressly repudiates the inference which might naturally and logically be drawn from his premises. God, ran his famous paradox, *ought to obey the devil*²⁰; that is, no one can escape from the duty of obedience to existing powers, be those powers never so depraved²¹. But there is logic also in Wycliffe's position. As things are, he felt, the spheres of ²⁰ This appears first in the later list of Wycliffe's errors, 1382: Lewis 358 nr vii, Shirley 278, 494. But it is perfectly in keeping with his earlier doctrine.

²¹ Wycliffe has a chapter in the De civili dominio, i. 28, in which he discusses, and decides in the affirmative sense, the duty of obedience to tyrants. Hic dicetur quod dupliciter contingit iuste obedire mundi potentibus: vel pure paci-

endo, servata caritate, quod non poterit esse malum; vel active ministrando in bonis fortune aut ministerio corporali, quod indubie, servata de possibili caritate, foret bonum. Yet, he hints, a Christian, 'si esset verisimile homini per subtractionem temporalis iuvamenis destruere potentatus tyrannidem vel abusum, debet ea intencione subtrahere.' f. 66 A, B.

^m cf. Shirley, intr., pp. lxiii-lxv.

CHAP. X.

and grace, or, from another point of view, the law of the Gospel, being alone essential to it, it follows necessarily that ^ohuman ordinances are accidental or indifferent. The latter, Wycliffe maintains, are in fact ^pthe mere consequence of the fall of man: they originate in sin, in the lust of lordship; and for the most part they betray their origin evidently enough by ^qthe opportunities they offer for wrong-doing and tyranny. When therefore we require, in addition to the natural lordship which is that of the Gospel, ^ran inferior sort of lordship, civil lordship, the latter, it is clear, must not pretend to any absolute or essential character; it is transitory and liable to modification according to the changing conditions of human society; above all it is entirely subordinate to that natural lordship ^sfrom which it draws whatever claim it may have to righteousness¹⁷. Accordingly, saving this one grand principle, Wycliffe does not care to lay down any fixed rules as to the best form of government. Like ^tOckham, he feels too deeply the necessary infirmity of all human institutions to be able to dogmatise about their relative excellence. ^uSuppose, he says, the whole people desire a certain man to be their civil ruler, it does not follow on that account that he is rightly their ruler; nor can any human laws touching hereditary succession or the conveyance of property make such succession or transfer righteous or true, unless they are conformable to the law of nature¹⁸.

^o Capp. 17, 34 ff. 38 C-40 C. 80 C, D.

^p Capp. 18, 21 ff. 41 B, 49 C.

^q Cap. 18 f. 42 B, C.

^r Ibid., ff. 41 B-42 A.

^s Capp. 5, 19 ff. 12 B, 43 A, B.

^t Cf. supra, pp. 277 sqq.

^u Deciv. dom. i. 18 f. 42 B.

¹⁷ Wycliffe thus states the distinction between natural and civil lordship: Dominium quidem naturale est dominium divinitus institutum, in primo titulo iusticie fundatum, quotlibet divites ex equo compaciens, sed alienacionem dominantis [cod. dominanter], servata iusticia, non permittens: dominium

autem civile est dominium occasione peccati humanitus institutum, incommunicabile singulis et, ex equo, multis dominis, sed abdicabile servata iusticia: Cap. 18 f. 40 D.

¹⁸ Nam non sequitur, 'Totus populus vult Petrum dominari civiliter; ergo iuste:' ymmo primus consensus populi ad aliquem civili-

The law of nature in Wycliffe's mouth is something far different from that of which other schoolmen found the exposition in the Politics of Aristotle. He adopts in fact the point of view of the strict hierarchical advocates, only with the all-important difference that his lawgiver is not the church but the Bible itself. CHAP. X.

There is therefore a lack of decision about Wycliffe's treatment of the different methods according to which a society may be governed. In the abstract he thinks ^{ Cap. 27 ff. 62 D-64 A.} that an aristocracy, by which he understands the rule of judges in the Old Testament sense, must surpass any other constitution, because it is the least connected with civil ordinances. He applies the example of the Israelite history, according to which, he says, judges were first set by God over his people and monarchy was a sign of their defection from the divine rule; finally, he adds, they came under the worst sort of rule, that of priests, which was most of all vitiated by human tradition and indeed altogether corrupt. Balancing the two former modes of government, ^{† Ibid., f. 65 A, B; cap. 28 f. 67 C.} Wycliffe appears to feel that, granted the sinful state of mankind, government by a single ruler is on the whole the most beneficial, since it is the strongest to restrain their excesses. ^{* Cap. 29 ff. 67 C-69 D.} He goes on to enquire whether lordship should be transmitted by hereditary succession or whether a fresh choice should take place at every vacancy. On the one hand it may be urged that the security of tenure possessed by an hereditary monarch, and the certainty he has of handing down his lordship to his son, is an

ter dominandum, qui tamen fuit a peccato purior, non fuit iustus nisi presupposita ratione, scilicet quod persona dominans sit a deo accepta ad illud officium; et per idem nulla

principia iuris civilis de successione hereditaria vel commutatione mutua terrenorum est iusta vel vera, nisi de quanto est legis nature particula: ibid., f. 42 B.

CHAP. X. inducement to him to play the tyrant; on the other hand this very fact may increase his care for his dominion and cause him to make the best use of it. It is here assumed, as regularly in the middle ages, that a prince whom the community has elected, it may depose; while an hereditary monarch, according to the common belief, could not be legally deprived of his power. Again, in favour of the elective principle, ^ait may be said that an election in which all qualified persons take part must be right. But Wycliffe, as we have seen, has no opinion of the value of the popular vote: *since the fall of man, he says, it generally happens that the electing community is, altogether or in its greater part, infected by crime; and thus it happens that it is at fault in elections, even as in other acts alike concerning God and the commonwealth*¹⁹. Wycliffe argues at length on both sides; incidently he discloses a good deal of political acuteness, and ^bhe leans towards a preference for the hereditary principle: but no experience or historical observation will induce him to forego the application here also of his first doctrine; and thus ^che decides that neither heredity nor election furnishes any title sufficient for the foundation of human lordship, without the anterior condition of grace in the person so elected or so succeeding. ^d*Wherefore it appears to me that the discreet theologian will determine nothing rashly as touching these laws, but will affirm according to law that it were better that all things should be had in common.*

^a Cap. 29
f. 68 C, D.

^b Cap. 30
f. 70 B, C.

^c Ibid.,
f. 69 D; cf.
cap. 29
sub fin.

^d Cap. 30
f. 71 C.

But lordship, as was stated at the outset, has another

¹⁹ The only concession he makes is as follows: Non est possibile communitatem in eleccione deficere, nisi peccatum pertinens sit in causa; deus enim non potest deficere ab instinctu regitivo populi secundum

sibi utilius, cum hoc quod populus utrobique deo faciat quidquid debet: f. 69 C. But it will be seen that the qualification repeated in this sentence deprives it of most of its value.

aspect to it; *the theory of the community of lordship in itself involves its counterpart, the community of service. In this we find the only check recognised by Wycliffe, upon the action of kings: they have a responsibility, not,—we may infer from the tenour of his argument,—to the people over whom they rule, but to God from whom they derive their lordship. †They are his stewards, and lords only by virtue of service. God is the only lord whose dominion is unattended by this condition; all other lords are servants not only of God but also of all their fellow-men. ‡The superscription of papal letters, servus servorum, acknowledges this truth in the most exalted of ecclesiastical potentates: [§]it has the authority of the apostle who bade the Galatians, [¶]By love serve one another. We have seen the corollary of this principle; since all are lords and all servants one of another, then, all things, all that we call property, must belong in common to all. But if we are startled by the premature socialism of the thesis, we have to bear in mind that Wycliffe had yet to learn its effects in practical life, as displayed in the excesses of the rebels of 1381. Such application indeed was never in his mind; nor did he ever pass a word which could be interpreted into approval of a violent assertion of those rights which notwithstanding he fully conceded. All things were all men's, but so long as the present state of polity subsisted it was unlawful to acquire them by force: for on the one hand the human constitution of society had the divine sanction, although it were imperfect by comparison with its eternal or evangelical ordering; and on the other hand force was incompatible with the primary dictates of the law of God.

Wycliffe's communism is thus expressly limited to a

CHAP. X.

* Cap. 11 f. 24 C. D; cf. cap. 32 f. 76 A.

† Cap. 19 f. 43 C. D.

‡ Capp. 11, 14 ff. 24 D, 32 D.

§ Cap. 11 f. 26 A.

¶ Gal. v. 13.

CHAP. X.

^k Cap. 9, 16
ff. 19 D, 20 A,
37 A, B, &c.

^l Cap. 12 f.
27 A-C.

condition of the world not present, but to be looked for and worked for: nor only thus; it is also limited to a field of possession other than that of human or temporal acquirement. ^k Earthly loss is heavenly gain, and the care of earthly things is a barrier to our love of those which are our proper objects. ^l If we seek the shadow we shall fail of the substance, but if we press forward to the substance the shadow will follow and attend us too. The righteous therefore has all things, not necessarily, not principally, in this present life; but as his right now, and as his sure and indefeasible enjoyment hereafter. His lordship, being founded in grace, has the warrant of God's decree: the fruition of it may be delayed, so far as earthly goods are concerned, but possession of all things remains his inalienable right. The sinner on the contrary by the very fact of sinning loses all right to anything. His lordship is no longer founded in grace, it has no substantial existence; it may seem to stand for a time, but he reaps his good on this earth only to be one day terribly recompensed.

This opposition between the righteous who have all things and the unrighteous who have nothing, runs through all Wycliffe's argument on the question of lordship. In it he finds the secret of the differences of human lot; by its means he is able to reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the troubles and disappointments of the good. He translates the Bible into the language of feudalism, and then having satisfied himself that Christianity and lordship are convertible terms, he proceeds to explain his new-found polity on a strictly spiritual basis. But however ideal the principle on which Wycliffe goes, it has none the less a very plain meaning when applied to the circumstances of the religious organism in the writer's own time. For the essence of the whole conception lies in the stress which he laid upon inner, as opposed to outer, elements as those which determine a man's proper merit. To Wycliffe it was the personal relation, the immediate dependence of the individual upon God, that made him worthy or unworthy; it was his own character and not his office, however exalted in the eyes of men, that constituted him what he really was. The pope himself, if unworthy, if personally a bad man, lost ipso facto his entire right to lordship.

CHAP. X.

Here however, as so often in Wycliffe, an important distinction has to be settled. Every good man, we have seen before, is lord of all things, but he is not on that account at liberty to assert his possession of them in contravention of civil right: so also ^{he} cannot claim to disobey the civil ruler because that ruler is personally unworthy of his post; his rule is at least permitted by God. Thus Wycliffe expressly repudiates the inference which might naturally and logically be drawn from his premises. God, ran his famous paradox, *ought to obey the devil*²⁰; that is, no one can escape from the duty of obedience to existing powers, be those powers never so depraved²¹. But there is logic also in Wycliffe's position. As things are, he felt, the spheres of ²⁰ cf. Shirley, intr., pp. lxiii-lxv.

²⁰ This appears first in the later list of Wycliffe's errors, 1382: Lewis 358 nr vii, Shirley 278, 494. But it is perfectly in keeping with his earlier doctrine.

²¹ Wycliffe has a chapter in the De civili dominio, i. 28, in which he discusses, and decides in the affirmative sense, the duty of obedience to tyrants. Hic dicetur quod dupliciter contingit iuste obedire mundi potentibus: vel pure paci-

endo, servata caritate, quod non poterit esse malum; vel active ministrando in bonis fortune aut ministerio corporali, quod indubie, servata de possibili caritate, foret bonum. Yet, he hints, a Christian, 'si esset verisimile homini per subtractionem temporalis iuvaminis destruere potentatus tyrannidem vel abusum, debet ea intencione subtrahere:' f. 66 A, B.

APPEND. II. potentissima in Pannonia, quam a Longobardis pene deletam eorundem prodit historia. Hic⁵, relicta patria, Franciam ad Carolum Calvum venit, a quo magna dignatione susceptus, familiarium partium habebatur; transigebatque cum eo (ut alias dixi⁶) tam seria quam ioca, individuusque comes tam mensae quam⁷ cubiculi erat: nec⁸ unquam inter eos fuit dissidium, quia miraculo scientiae eius rex captus, adversus magistrum quamvis ira praeproperum, nec dicto insurgere vellet. Regis ergo rogatu Hierarchiam Dionysii de Graeco in Latinum de verbo verbum⁹ transtulit: quo fit ut vix intelligatur Latina¹⁰, quae volubilitate magis Graeca quam positione construitur nostra¹¹, composuit et¹² librum quem *ἐπεὶ φύσεων μερισμοῦ*¹³, id est, de naturae divisione, titulavit, propter quarundam perplexarum quaestionum solutionem¹⁴ bene utilem si tamen ignoscatur ei in quibusdam¹⁵, quibus¹⁶ a Latinorum tramite deviauit, dum in Graecos nimium¹⁷ oculos intendit¹⁸. Fuit multae lectionis et curiosae, acris sed inelegantis, ut dixi, ^f perifision, id est.

^g deest.

⁵ At this point the other narratives begin. The following is the text of the Gesta pontificum with which I collate that of the Gesta regum: Huius tempore venit Angliam [G R Hoc tempore creditur fuisse] Iohannes Scottus, vir perspicacis ingenii et multae facundiae, qui dudum relicta patria [G R dudum increpantibus undique bel-lorum fragoribus in] Frantiam ad Karolum Calvum transierat. The Gesta regum proceeds at once to the sentence beginning in the text of the Epistle with the words Regis ergo [G R cuius; G P Caroli ergo] rogatu.

⁶ G P omit ut alias dixi.

⁷ G P et mensae et.

⁸ What follows, as far as the word vellet, is wanting in the Gesta pontificum, which contain instead the famous stories about the Scot and the sot, and the little fishes and the fat clerks.

⁹ G R and G P Dionysii Areopagitae in Latinum de Graeco, verbum verbo.

¹⁰ G P add littera.

¹¹ G R omit quo fit to nostra.

¹² G R and G P etiam.

¹³ G P Perifision merimnoi.

¹⁴ G R propter perplexitatem necessariarum quaestionum solvendam; G P propter perplexitatem quarundam quaestionum solvendam.

¹⁵ G R aliquibus.

¹⁶ G R and G P prefix in.

¹⁷ G R and G P acriter.

¹⁸ After intendit the Gesta regum go on directly with Succedentibus annis munificentia Elfredi allectus, venit Angliam, et apud monasterium nostrum a pueris quos docebat graphiis, ut fertur, perforatus, etiam martyr aestimatus est: quod sub ambiguo ad iniuriam sanctae animae non dixerim, cum celebrem eius memoriam sepulchrum in sinistro latere altaris et epitaphii prodant versus, scabri quidem et moderni temporis lima carentes, sed ab antiquo non adeo deformes. The verses follow. The Gesta pontificum omit the passage Fuit multae to occulebat, but from that point onwards agree closely with the text of the Epistola.

ad interpretandum scientiae; quod eum (ut verbis Anastasii APPEND. II. Romanae Ecclesiae bibliothecarii loquar) non egisse aliam ob causam existimo, nisi quia, cum esset humilis spiritu, non prae-sumsit verbi proprietatem deserere, ne aliquo modo a sensus veritate decideret. Doctus ad invidiam, ut Graecorum pedissequus, qui multa quae non recipiant aures Latinae, libris suis asperserit: quae non ignorans quam invidiosa lectoribus essent, vel sub persona collocutoris sui, vel sub pallio Graecorum occultabat. Quapropter¹⁹ et haereticus putatus est, et scripsit²⁰ contra eum quidam Florus. Sunt enim²¹ in libro *ἡ περὶ φύσεως*²² perplurima quae multorum aestimatione²³, a fide catholica²⁴ exorbitare²⁵ videantur. Huius opinionis²⁶ i cognoscitur¹ fuisse²⁷ Nicolaus papa, qui ait in Epistola ad Carolum, Relatum est apostolatu nostro quod opus beati Dionysii Areopagitae, quod de divinis nominibus vel coelestibus ordinibus, Graeco descripsit eloquio, quidam²⁸ vester Iohannes genere Scottus nuper in Latinum transtulerit; quod iuxta morem nobis mitti, et nostro^k debuit iudicio²⁹ approbari, praesertim cum idem Ioannes, licet^k iudicio debuit. multae scientiae esse praedicetur, olim non sane sapere in quibusdam frequenti rumore diceretur³⁰. Itaque³¹ quod hactenus omissum est, vestra industria suppleat, et nobis praefatum opus sine ulla cunctatione mittat. Propter hanc ergo infamiam, ut³² credo, taeduit eum Franciae, venitque Angliam³³ ad regem Aelfredum, cuius munificentia illectus, et magisterio eius, ut ex scriptis eius³⁴ intellexi, sublimis, Malmesburiae³⁵ resedit. Ubi post aliquot annos a pueris quos decebat, graphiis perfossus³⁶, animam exuit tormento gravi et acerbo; ut dum iniquitas valida et manus infirma saepe frustraretur, et saepe impeteret, amaram mortem obiret. Iacuit aliquandiu³⁷ in ecclesia illa³⁸, ¹⁹ G P quare.

²⁰ For et scripsit, G P scripsit-que.

²¹ After enim G P insert revera.

²² G P perifision.

²³ For multorum aestimatione, G P nisi diligenter discutiantur.

²⁴ G P catholicorum.

²⁵ G P abhorrentia.

²⁶ G P insert particeps.

²⁷ G P fuisse cognoscitur.

²⁸ So G P as quoted by Gale:

Hamilton's edition has quidem.

²⁹ G P iudicio debuit.

³⁰ G P dicatur.

³¹ G P omit this sentence.

³² G P omit ut.

³³ G P omit Angliam.

³⁴ G P regis.

³⁵ G P Melduni.

³⁶ G P foratus.

³⁷ G P here insert inhonora sepultura.

³⁸ G P in beati Laurentii ecclesia.

APPEND. II. quae fuerat infandae caedis conscia; sed ubi divinus favor multis noctibus super eum lucem indulsit igneam, admoniti monachi in maiorem eum³⁹ transtulerunt ecclesiam, et ad sinistram altaris positum⁴⁰, his praedicaverunt versibus martyrem⁴¹:

Conditus hoc⁴² tumulo, sanctus sophista Ioannes,
Qui ditatus erat vivens iam⁴³ dogmate miro,
Martyrio tandem meruit conscendere coelum,
Quo semper regnant cuncti per secula sancti⁴⁴.

Sed et Anastasius de insigni sanctitate adhuc viventem collaudat his verbis ad Carolum.

[Here follows an extract from Anastasius the librarian, to which William adds :]

Alternant ergo de laudibus eius et infamia diversa scripta, quamvis iampridem laudes praeponderaverint. Tantum artifice valuit eloquentia ut magisterio eius manus¹ dederit omnis Gallia. Verum si qui maiorem audaciam anhelant, ut synodus quae tempore Nicolai papae secundi Turonis congregata est, non in eum sed in scripta eius durior sententiam praecipitant. Sunt ergo haec fere quae controversiam pariunt.

¹ dedit.

^m Spec. histor. xxv. 42.

ⁿ Chron. xlvii script. Cisterc. 114.

5. This is the account of John Scot's end which was received throughout the middle ages. The little that^m Vincent of Beauvais, to take but a single instance, says about him, is all derived, including the epitaph, through the channel ofⁿ Helinand, from William of Malmesbury. William has, in common with Asser, just three points, (a) that John was a learned man, (b) that he was invited from Gaul by king Alfred, and (c) that he taught in England;

³⁹ For in maiorem eum, G P eum in maiorem.

⁴⁰ G P ponentes.

⁴¹ For his praedicaverunt versibus martyrem, G P his martirium eius versibus praedicaverunt.

⁴² G P Conditur hoc; G R Clauditur in.

⁴³ G R and G P iam vivens.

⁴⁴ The last two lines are in the Gesta regum as follow:

Martyrio tandem Christi conscendere regnum

Quo, meruit, regnant sancti per secula cuncti.

In the Gesta pontificum:

Martyrio tandem Christi conscendere regnum

Quo, meruit, regnant cuncti per secula sancti.

Here the two narratives end, so far as the Scot is concerned.

in other words exactly what Asser relates about John the companion of Grimbald, with the exception of the notice that he was priest and monk: it has nothing corresponding to what he says of John the Saxon. Apart from the question of nationality, the latter was made abbat of Athelney, and his life was attempted by the servants of two Gaulish brethren of the monastery; whereas John the Scot, according to William of Malmesbury, went not to Athelney but to Malmesbury; he was not abbat, simply a teacher; was murdered not at the instigation of monks, but by the boys whom he taught. There is not one point in common between the two, except the name John. Nor are the facts in which William agrees with Asser's description of the other John necessarily derived from him. William himself says he took them ex scriptis regis; and he adds so much of his own, about John's life in France and his writings, that we cannot lay much stress upon his dependence on Asser for three simple particulars. He had plainly more precise sources which may have yielded these three facts as well as the rest of what he relates.

6. With the epitaph quoted by William as commemorating this sanctus sophista Ioannes, we may connect a notice which is contained in a chronicle referred to by °du Boulay as the Historia a Roberto Rege ad Mortem Philippi I:—

° Hist. univ.
Paris. 2. 443.

In dialectica hi potentes extiterunt sophistae, Ioannes qui eandem artem sophisticam vocalem esse disseruit, Robertus Parisiacensis, Rocelinus Compendiensis, Arnulphus Laudunensis. Hi Ioannis fuerunt sectatores qui etiam quamplure habuerunt auditores.

° M Hauréau rejects the comparison with the Malmesbury inscription, but he is in the meshes of the old snare about John the Saxon. His caution in refusing to apply the inscription as a means for explaining the Paris chronicle will be respected; but when he urges on other grounds that the Johannes 'sophista' of the latter is identical with John

° De la phil.
scol. i. 174
sq.; hist. de la phil. scol.
i. 244-247.

APPEND. II. Scot, we are entitled in using this conversely as evidence for the credibility of William of Malmesbury's account. M Hauréau's identification has since received powerful support from the arguments of ^a professor von Prantl ⁴⁵; and if their conclusion be accepted, it is surely unreasonable to hesitate about admitting further that this John Scot 'the Sophist' is the same person with his contemporary John Sophist, whose epitaph William records; especially when the latter, no doubt repeating an old tradition of the monastery, expressly identifies this sophist with the Scot. The extract in du Boulay is therefore a piece of evidence that converges with those in the preceding paragraphs to one centre. We may or may not believe all that William says, but this we may affirm positively, that his narrative is self-consistent and intelligible, and that it is incompatible with, and contradictory to, the whole concoction with which the false Ingulf has entrapped our modern critics.

7. My apology for dwelling so long upon what is really obvious, namely that John the Saxon has nothing whatever to do with John the Scot, is the confusion that has run through all the criticism of the subject down to the present time. ^r Gfroerer, for instance, while rightly observing that if Asser's two Johns be the same person, that person cannot be John the Scot, proceeds to say that Ingulf, Simeon, and William, 'plainly resting on the witness of Asser, have held our Erigena and the priest-monk John, invited by Alfred, for one and the same person, since they relate that Erigena followed the call of Alfred about the year 880 to England.' Therefore, he concludes, John the Scot never came to England at all, but died in France about the year 875 ⁴⁶.

⁴⁵ I have since read the objections of Dr Deutsch, Peter Abälard 100 n. 3, which, though undoubtedly of weight, appear to me to depend too much upon considerations as to the precise character and contents of a chronicle which we know in fact only through du Boulay.

⁴⁶ Mabillon, Actt. SS. O. s. B. 4

^a Gesch. der logik im abendl. 2. 20-31.

^r Vol. 3. 938.

*Johannes Huber takes up the same line of argument, APPEND. II. and alleges the divergences between the (combined) 'ac- Pp. 115 sq. counts of Asser and that of William as examples of how a legend may change in the course of two hundred years. But how, he asks, could William make a blunder about his own monastery? It is plainly only another proof of the chronicler's extreme inaccuracy, an inaccuracy shown moreover by the circumstance that he actually records an epitaph which had confessedly been destroyed before his time. To this comment it is natural to answer that, if there is one thing more than another that was likely to pass down from mouth to mouth in a monastery, it was a set of verses commemorating a popular figure in its traditions. The very variants that appear in William's recital of the lines might by themselves persuade us that he was not copying from an existing gravestone but recording an oral tradition.

Huber's conclusion is that the whole story originated in the chronicle of Ingulf, the late fabrication of which he did not suspect. Assuming that William and the rest drew their information from Ingulf, and regarding his narrative as conjectural, Huber reverts to Asser. Is it possible to accept what Asser says about his first John (the companion of Grimbald) and abandon the Saxon abbat of Athelney? He answers in the negative by a most curious train of argument, in which he constantly assumes the identity of the two persons who are now ex hypothesi distinct. The only two questions raised that are really of moment relate (a) to John's age, and (b) to his clerical standing: but we must first notice for a moment the arguments of those

(2) 511, in identifying Asser's two Johns, lays an improper stress upon the accuracy and completeness of the author's book, which recent criticism absolutely contradicts. He therefore declares against the identification with John Scot, pp. 508-511. He has, however, rightly observed the difference between William of Malmesbury's John, and the abbat of Athelney, pp. 512 sq., and thinks that William blundered in making the former come from Charles the Bald. According to this theory he would be simply an obscure 'Johannes Sophista.'

APPEND. II. critics who accept in the main the authority of William of Malmesbury.

* J. Scotus Erigena I.
120, 144.

*Staudenmaier has an elaborate argument in favour of there having been two Johns invited by Alfred from abroad, and lays special stress upon the notice of one John (in his opinion, our Scot) having taught at Oxford. In this fact, however, we have little interest, since the passage in Asser referring to Oxford is acknowledged to be an interpolation, and the supposed 'university' of Alfred's foundation does not admit of serious discussion. Staudenmaier explains the confusion in Ingulf between John the scholar and John the abbat of Athelney on the ground that in the interval of two centuries details would get perplexed while the main fact would be still preserved⁴⁷: but he does not explain how it was that this confusion is absent from the (ostensibly later) narrative of William of Malmesbury. The acceptance, in fact, of the historical character of Ingulf remained the great difficulty in the way of a clear understanding of the facts.

* Pp. 125 sqq. 8. * Staudenmaier fairly answers the objections raised by Mabillon and repeated by Huber as to the impossibility of John Scot's visit to England so late as after the year 880. There is no reason, because he is known to have gone to France before 847, to conclude that he must have been born before 815, 'between 800 and 815,' as * Huber decides; on the other hand † Staudenmaier takes the extreme limit when he suggests the possibility that John was born in 828. Probably, if any conclusion is to be drawn from the slenderest of premises, we should be war-

* P. 42.

† P. 127.

⁴⁷ Staudenmaier also suggests, p. 137, that Ingulf had not Asser's work before him, although it is as clear as noonday that he was trying to combine and reconcile the different accounts which he read in Asser and William. Professor Christlieb, who follows closely in Staudenmaier's track, thinks, p. 51, that Ingulf wrote in France, and therefore might easily have confounded places in England like Athelney and Malmesbury. He takes from this fact of his foreign residence an additional argument for John's having come to England; had he died in France, Ingulf must have known of it. The naïveté of criticism like this hardly needs comment.

ranted in assuming that the young Scot came to the Frankish court when he was between twenty and thirty: he can hardly have been born much later than 825, but he may have been born as early as 815. But even should we accept Huber's date for John's birth, it does not follow as a matter of course that 'since, according to Asser's account, he must have gone to England as late as 884, he must have been called by Alfred at an age when one can look forward to little or no future activity as a teacher,' and when he could hardly have had much inclination to change his country and enter upon new surroundings. Setting aside, what has already appeared, that Asser's notice does not belong to any particular date, and may indeed refer to any time from 878 onwards, it is obvious to reply that one cannot assert the impossibility of a man's working power lasting until or beyond his seventieth year. *Gilbert de la Porrée had been a student for fifty-four years when he was made bishop of Poitiers, and he lived an active life for twelve years more. At the same time there is no positive ground for excluding the alternative date for John Scot's birth, which would make him fifty-three in 878 or fifty-nine in 884. Either side is equally arguable: neither furnishes a basis for establishing or refuting the credit of the story.

9. The other main difficulty which is alleged against John's retirement to England concerns his ecclesiastical position. The first point to be borne in mind is that William of Malmesbury makes no mention of him as anything but a plain teacher. It is true that Staudenmaier, whose conclusion on this head is repeated practically by the ^b later biographers, insists that William's John was abbat; but the only reason he can give is that the chron- icler relates the destruction of John's tomb in connexion with Warinus de Liro's sacrilegious treatment of past abbats of Malmesbury. The passage is as follows:

APPEND. II.

* Huber 117.

* v. supra, p. 133 n. 29.

^b Christlieb 43, 45; Huber 111, 118.

APPEND. II. ^c Huic [Turolodo] substitutus est Warinus de Lira monachus.

^c Gest. pontif. . . . Is, cum primum ad abbatiam venit, antecessorum facta parvipendens, tipo quodam et nausia sanctorum corporum ferebatur. Ossa denique sanctae memoriae Meildulfi et ceterorum qui, olim ibi abbates posteaque in pluribus locis antistites, ob reverentiam patroni sui Aldhelmi se in loco tumultum iri iussissent, quos antiquitas veneranda in duobus lapideis crateris ex utraque parte altaris, dispositis inter cuiusque ossa ligneis intervallis, reverenter statuerat; hæc, inquam, omnia pariter conglobata, velut acervum rudrum, velut reliquias vilium mancipiorum, ecclesiae foribus alienavit. Et ne quid impudentiae deesset, etiam sanctum Iohannem Scottum, quem pene pari quo sanctum Aldhelmum veneratione monachi colebant, extulit. Hos igitur omnes in extremo angulo basilicæ sancti Michahelis, quam ipse dilatari et exaltari iusserat, inconsiderate oculi lapidibusque praecludi praecepit.

Reading this extract carefully, it should appear that we have just as much right to infer that William is carefully distinguishing between John and the abbats, as that he intends to identify them. In fact it is nearly certain that Staudenmaier would not have suspected the latter possibility unless he had been misled by the notion that William had before him the supposititious work of Ingulf.

Returning then to the John, the companion of Grimbald, in the narrative of Asser, we find him described as 'priest and monk.' Now all we know about John Scot's clerical position from contemporary evidence is entirely negative. Prudentius of Troyes, indeed, ridicules him for setting himself up as a disputant in a grave controversy, being ^d barbarum et nullis ecclesiasticæ dignitatis gradibus insignitum. But it is plain that his not holding any office in the church, which is all the words need mean, does not involve the consequence that John was not ordained. ^e Abailard, for instance, had, in all probability, only inferior orders until he was in middle life; yet he afterwards was appointed abbat. It is no doubt the fact that John is never styled

^d ap. Huber
118 n. 1.

^e v. supra,
pp. 147 sq.

'priest' or 'monk' by any of his opponents: nor does he ever describe himself as such, after the prevailing fashion, in his writings. But the latter circumstance, at least, has a very natural explanation: he desired to rank as a philosopher, not as a priest. This is indeed, as ^f Dr Reuter observes, a salient characteristic of his position in the history of Christian thought; and it would be readily accepted by his enemies as a confirmation of their judgement that he was a heretic. We are not to expect that they would signalise, if they were aware of, his priestly calling. We may therefore accept, or not accept, the record of Asser as relating to John Scot, as we please. I have already urged that William of Malmesbury may be safely considered irrespectively of it;—but certainly there is nothing in this question of clerical or non-clerical standing to affect it.

APPEND. II.

^f Gesch. der relig. aufklärung im mittelalter 1. 51.

10. On the other hand, it is a great mistake to extract from the title of martyr, which even William of Malmesbury, ^gin one of his accounts, was inclined to refuse John, an identification with another John Scot, who held a place in the martyrologies, at least in England and France, until 1586, when I presume it occurred to the orthodox that the philosopher was unqualified for the dignity⁴⁸. It is strange that ^h Staudenmaier and others who repeat the statement have not observed the conclusive refutation given by ⁱ Mabillon. There can be absolutely no doubt that the martyr who was commemorated on the 14th of November was ^k John Scot, bishop of Mecklenburg, who was killed on that day in 1066.

^g Supra, p. 318 n. 18.

^h Pp. 147 sqq.

ⁱ Ubi supra, p. 513.

^k Adam. Brem. gest. Hammaburg. eccl. pontif. iii. 20, 50, Pertz 7. 343, 355.

11. I may notice in conclusion ⁴⁹ an attempt made by ⁴⁸ Thus in A. du Saussay's Martyrologium Gallicanum, the name (which is given as tempore Caroli Calvi) is relegated to the appendix, vol. 2. 1226, Paris 1637, folio.

⁴⁹ It has not seemed worth while to repeat all the various theories which have been held in respect to

John Scot's history in older times; and I have limited myself to those received into the recent books treating of the subject. But it is curious to notice that Tritheim dichotomises the Scot. According to him, De Scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, 119 sq., ed. Cologne 1546, quarto, APPEND. II. dean Milman to select from the various opinions with regard to John Scot's retirement into England. ¹ He thinks (a) that John fled into England 'under the general denunciation of the church and the pope,' apparently following William of Malmesbury, but disregarding the long interval between John's participation in the Gottschalk controversy and the earliest possible date for his withdrawal from France; (b) 'he is said to have taken refuge in Alfred's new university of Oxford.' In a note we read that 'the account of his death is borrowed by Matthew of Westminster from that of a later John the Saxon, who was stabbed by some monks in a quarrel,' which statement is evidently taken directly from Guizot's Cour d'Histoire moderne, 3. 174 sq. (1829). 'The flight to England,' adds Milman, 'does not depend on the truth of that story.' This last sentence appears to me absolutely correct; but it is not warranted by the critical premises on which it rests. Matthew of Westminster did not borrow his story about John Scot's death from an account of 'a later,'—if he be later—'John the Saxon,' but took his matter directly from William of Malmesbury⁵⁰. Besides, we have already seen the entire dissimilarity of the stories about John the Scot and John the Saxon, particularly in reference to the circumstances of their deaths.

12. My conclusion upon the whole evidence is briefly as follows:—

a. It is possible that Asser does refer to John Scot, as the companion of Grimbold; but it is more than im-

'Iohannes dictus Erigena' translated the 'Hierarchiam et libros Dionysii' with commentaries, 'et quaedam alia.' 'Iohannes Scotus,' on the other hand, p. 115, was a pupil of Bede and a comrade of Alcuin; to him is due the exposition of saint Matthew, 'one book' [scilicet] De divisione naturae, and another book, De officiis humanis; 'alia quoque multa composuit,' adds Trittenheim, 'quae ad notitiam meam non venerunt.' It is needless to say that this arrangement has not found support in modern times.

⁵⁰ Why do Milman and Hauréau, Histoire de la Philosophie scolastique 1. 151, and so many others, refer to Matthew for facts which he only states at second or third hand?

probable that he identifies him with the abbat of APP. II, III.
Athelney :

b. William of Malmesbury's account possibly, but by no means necessarily, has drawn a fact or two from the former ; it is altogether irreconcilable with the latter :

c. It is the combination of the two persons in Asser, resting on the imagined authority of Ingulf, that has misled the modern critics, and induced the majority of them to discredit the narrative of William of Malmesbury, as though it depended upon that late forgery.

d. William's account may therefore be judged entirely by itself, and accepted or rejected just as we may rate the chronicler's general credibility : there is no reason for excluding these particular passages from that respect which ^a those scholars who know William best are ready to pay ^a Cf. Hardy 2. 156, 164. to his honest, conscientious labours.

III. NOTE ON A SUPPOSED THEOLOGICAL EXPOSITION BY GERBERT.

IN the ^a Catalogi librorum manuscriptorum Angliae et Hiberniae, the Bodleian manuscript 2406 is described as ^a P. 124, Oxford 1697 folio. containing at f. 170*b* an Expositio in Canticum Gereberti Papae in Spiritum sanctum. From this ^o Oudin quotes the ^o Comment. de script. eccl. 2. 512. title correctly with one important exception : for 'canticum' he writes 'Canticum Canticorum.' The ^p Histoire littéraire de la France ^p Vol. 6. 589; 1742. draws a different conclusion from the words of the Catalogue. Gerbert, says the Histoire, 'composa un Cantique sur le saint Esprit, qui avec son commentaire faisoit autrefois partie des manuscrits de Thomas Bodlei, sous le nombre 1406. [sic] 10,' and the writer speculates as to its date and contents. The manuscript itself, however, at the place indicated, contains, at the end of a volume of Anglo-Saxon homilies, a page filled up in a thirteenth-century hand with glosses upon a sequence for the feast of saint Michael and all angels, which, so far as I APPEND. III. can discover, is found only in the Sarum Missal, and of which the authorship is apparently claimed by the glossator for Gerbert. Whether also a portion of the glosses themselves is to be regarded as Gerbert's composition, I must leave undecided: certainly the introductory passage proclaims itself to be the work of a commentator. Hitherto the text has only been published in M Olleris's edition of ^{¶ Pp. 568-572.} Gerbert's works. The editor gives the following account of it—'On attribue à Gerbert un cantique sur le saint-Esprit, cantica de s. Spiritu, conservé dans la bibliothèque Bodléienne, et une prose ajoutée au canon de la messe en honneur des anges. . . M H. O. Coxe n'a pas trouvé le cantique, et il a eu la complaisance de copier lui-même le commentaire suivant.' Since, however, M Olleris could not identify the canticum nor print the glosses without a multitude of grammatical and other mistakes, not to speak of sundry hiatus which show that he could not decipher Mr Coxe's handwriting, I have thought it worth while to edit the whole afresh; and I have prefixed the sequence to which it refers, and with the punctuation unaltered, from the edition of the [†] Sarum Missal published at Paris in 1555, folio:—

† Sanctoriale, fol. lix.

Ad celebres rex celice laudes cuncta.
Pangat nunc canora caterva symphonia.
Odas atque solvat concio tibi nostra.
Cum iam renovatur Michaelis inclyta valde festa.
Per quem letabunda perornatur machina mundi tota.
Novies distincta: pneumatum sunt agmina per te facta.
Sed cum vis facis hec flammea ceu rutilantia sydera.
Inter primeva sunt hec nam creata tua, cum simus nos ultima factura: sed imago tua.
Theologa categorizent symbola nobis hec ter tripartita: per privata officia.
Plebs angelica, phalanx et archangelica principans turma, virtus uranica, ac potestas almiphonia Dominantia numina, divinaque subsellia cherubin etherea ac seraphim ignicoma.

Vos o Michael celi satrapa, Gabrielque vera dans verbi nuncia. APPEND. III.

Atque Raphael vite vernula : conferte nos inter paradiscolas.

Per quos patris cuncta complentur mandata que dat.

Eiusdem sophia : compar quoque pneuma : una permanens in usia.

Cui estis administrancia deo milia milium sacra.

Vices per bis quinas bis atque quingenta dena.

Centena millena assistunt in aula ad quam rex ovem centesimam.

Verbigena drachmamque decimam vestra duxit super almatha.

Vos per ethera nos per rura devia.

Pars electa armonie vota demus hyperlyrica cithara.

Ut post bella Michaelis inclyta.

Nostra deo sint accepta auream circa aram thymiamata.

Quo in celesti iam gloria.

Condecantemus alleluia.

* AD ⁵¹ CELEBRES, REX CELICE. In primo notandum quod hoc nomen canticum plures habet acceptiones. Dicitur enim canticum applausus qui fit ad laudem alicuius divitis, dicitur etiam canticum leticia de terrenis habita. Dicitur etiam canticum cantus quem fecerunt filii Israel quando rediere de servitute, id est, cantica canticorum. Dicitur etiam canticum omne tale gaudium quod fit de supercelestibus; et secundum hoc hic accipitur hoc nomen canticum. Sed querendum est, quis sit autor huius opusculi quod pre manibus habemus, que materia, que utilitas, que intencio, cui parti philosophie pertineat; ita dico si alicui pertineat. Autor huius operis fuit papa Girebertus, qui, cum mirabilis esset in omnibus actibus suis, precipue verborum et sententiarum erat perturbator. Materia est spiritus increatus et spiritus creatus. Spiritus increatus est ipse deus. Spiritus creati sunt, ut angeli et archangeli. Intencio est excitare animos auditorum ad laudes supercelestium. Utilitas est celestes laudes exercere. Sed videtur quod nulli parti philosophie pertineat, sed potius teologie. Theos idem

* Cod. Bodl.
343 f. 170 b.

⁵¹ The initial is not filled in.

APPEND. III. est quod deus; logos, sermo. Theologia in duas dividitur species: in ypoteticam et apoteticam. Ypotetica est sermo trinitatis ad unitatem; et econtra apotetica est sermo de super-celestibus, ut de angelis et archangelis. Autor iste primo utitur apologo, quasi proemio tocius operis sequentis, captando benivolentiam ipsius creatoris, antequam incipiat opusculum suum; dicens, O REX. Sed quia hoc nomen convenit regibus nostris, adjunxit CELICE: et est composita diccio ab hoc nomine celum et hoc nomine cunctos, quasi cunctos celi. CUNCTA CATERVA NOSTRA, tam homines quam angeli. CLANGAT, id est quodam clamore clamet; vel PANGAT, id est cantet. CUM NOSTRA SIMPHONIA, id est cum clara simphonia; vel CANORA SIMPHONIA, id est sonora simphonia. Symphonia dicitur a sin, quod est con, et phonos, quod est sonus. Sic triumphus dicitur quasi trium phonos, quasi vox trium sonorum; et potest dici illa concordantia que est mentis et oris, vel illa que est inter ipsos sonos plurium personarum. AD CELEBRES LAUDES, id est ad festivas laudes; ATQUE NOSTRA CONTIO, idem est quod nostra caterva. SOLVAT, id est quasi debitum reddat. ODAS, id est laudes; unde dicitur in alio loco palinodas, id est duplices laudes, a palin, quod est duplex, et odas, quod est laudes. Deinde redit ad propositum. Sed notandum quod hec festivitas non fit de pugna que fuit inter Michaellem et draconem, sed de miraculo quod contigit in Gargano monte. CUM IAM FESTA MICHAELIS VALDE INCLITA. Cleos idem est quod gloria; inde inclita, id est valde gloriosa, quia in ponitur ibi augmentative et non privative. Renovantur, id est annuatim quadam renovatione celebrantur. PER QUEM, id est Michaelem, PERORNANTUR, id est bene ornantur, LETABUNDA; id est illa festa sunt quadam leticia habundanter celebranda. TOTA MACHINA, id est cum omni illo quod continetur sub firmamento. MUNDI: Mundus dicitur microcosmos, a *micro*⁵² quod est longus, et cosmus quod est mundus; id est celestis mundus qui semper durat: vel microcosmus dicitur a micro, quod est brevis, et cosmus, mundus, id est minor mundus, id est ipse homo. Quia sicut mundus constat ex quatuor elementis, sic

⁵² Originally written meccocos- mus a mecco; but dotted for correction, and with an i in each case above the e.

homo ex quatuor humoribus qui concordant quatuor elementis. APPEND. III.
 Sanguis enim concordat aeri, quia calidus est et humidus sicut aer. Colera concordat igni, quia calida est et sicca sicut ignis. Flegma concordat aque, quia frigidus et humidus sicut aqua. Melancolia concordat terre, quia frigida et sicca sicut terra. Vel mundus dicitur a mundiori parte mundane machine, id est a firmamento. AGMINA, id est consortia. NEUPMATUM: hoc nomen neupma duplicem habet acceptionem et potest cognosci in scripcione. Quando sic scribitur, *pneuma*⁵³, per p et n, tunc portendit iubilum, qui fit post antiphonam; qui iubilus non potest exprimi corde et ore, sed sono tantum: et fit ad designandum celeste gaudium, quod non potest corde nec ore, pre eius magnitudine, sed sono et intellectu tantum, demonstrari. Quando vero scribitur sic, mneuma, per m et n, vel sic per n tantum, neuma, tunc significat spiritum, secundum quod hic accipitur. Mneumatum, id est spirituum. Per te, id est deum. Facta: improprie utitur hic nomine facta, quia aliud est fieri et aliud est creari. Fieri enim est facere aliquid ex traduce⁵⁴, id est ex preiacenti materia; creari est aliquid facere sine preiacenti materia, quia deus creavit angelos sine preiacenti materia et cotidie potest creare sic cotidie novas animas. DISTINCTA, id est divisa. NOVIES, id est per novem, id quia novem sunt ordines angelorum. NAM CUM VIS, id est quando vis. FACIS HEC FLAMMEA, id est accipere igneam formam quando nunciant hominibus: vel aliter, flammea, propter ardorem caritatis quem predicant hominibus. INTER PRIMEVA SUNT HEC: hic ostendit quod quodammodo antiquiores sunt angeli quam homines; ut dicitur, In principio creavit deus celum et terram. Per celum intellege celestia, per terram, terrestria; et sic quemdam primatum habent angeli ante homines. CUM NOS SIMUS CREATA, id est procreata: et notandum quod aliud est creari et aliud procreari et aliud fieri: creari, ut superius dictum est, facere aliquid sine traduce; ut cum materiali fit et forma, et cum forma fit et materia: procreari, id est procul creari, ut ex nuce lignum: et fieri pertinet ad

⁵³ Cod. pneuma.

⁵⁴ Apparently the original reading was ratione, which has been corrected into traduce. M Olleris has divisione, but this neither the manuscript nor common sense will allow.

APPEND. III. ipsum hominem et proprie⁵⁵. Unde dicitur homo facitor.

ULTIMA CREATA, id est procreata. SED YMAGO TUA: aliud est imago et aliud similitudo. Ymago, quia nos imitamur deum in iusticia et sapientia et prudentia, quia ipse iustus est et iusticia; sic et nos iusti per iusticiam, etc.: similitudo est in lineamentis corporis. CATEGORIZENT, id est predicent. THEOLOGA: quid sint theologa, superius dictum est. SIMBOLA: symbolum est communis proporcio vel comproporcio, ut in convivio; et dicitur a sin, quod est con, et bolos, quod est proporcio. Et dicitur symbolum dominica oratio, scilicet Credo et *Quicumque*⁵⁶ vult, ubi est collectio plurium articulorum Christiane fidei; vel symbolum dicitur ministeria⁵⁷ angelorum, quia sepe ea que ministrant et alia significant. TER TRIPARTITA, id est per novenarium disposita. PER PRIVATA OFICIA, id est per propria officia. Notandum quod hoc nomen officium, quando scribitur per unum f, tunc idem est quod servire; et quando scribitur per duo f, tunc idem est quod nocere, unde officit ei. PLEBS ANGELICA PHALANX ET ARCHANGELICA. Sed quia autor in sequentibus facit mentionem de gerarchia, ideo videndum est, quid sit gerarchia, et unde dicatur, et in quot species dividatur. Gerarchia est legitimum nature rationalis dominium; et videndum est quid quodlibet membrum in hac descriptione positivum⁵⁸ operetur. Dominium dicitur, quia in nullo loco est gerarchia nisi ubi sit dominium nature. Rationalis dicitur, quia bruta animalia habent dominium super alia, que non dicitur gerarchia, quia ibi non contingit, nec eis convenit. Legitimum dicitur, quia reges et huiusmodi habent potestatem super alios, et hic forsitan non habent secundum legem legitime. Gerarchia dicitur a gere, quod est sacer, et archos, quod est principatus sive dominium. Gerarchia in tres dividitur species; in supercelestem, celestem, et subcelestem. Supercelestis est summe trinitatis ypostasica monarchia: ypostasion vel ypostasis idem est quod substantia. Celestis gerarchia est ordo angelicus, qui dividitur in novem ordines. Subcelestis gerarchia, id est apostolatus et archiepiscopatus et episcopatus, et huiusmodi. De supercelesti gerarchia facit autor inferius mentionem quando

⁵⁵ The reading is very doubtful.

⁵⁶ Cod. Cuicumque.

⁵⁷ Cod. mist'ia.

⁵⁸ Cod. p'itū.

dixit, PER VOS PATRIS CUNCTA COMPLENTUR MANDATA QUE DAT. APPEND. III.

De celesti gerarchia fecit mencionem quando dixit, VOS PER ETHRA. De subcelesti gerarchia fecit mencionem quando dixit, VOS PER BURA. Sed quia dixi superius quod celestis gerarchia dividitur in novem ordines, ideo videndum est, quid sit ordo, et qualiter dicatur ordo, et in quot species habeat dividi. Ordo angelicus, ut ait magister Johannes Scotus, est caractere theophanie simplicis et non imaginarie et reciproce uniformis spirituum insignita multitudo. Multitudo apponitur quia ordo angelicus non potest esse nisi ubi sit multitudo. Spirituum apponitur ad differenciam hominum, quia sepe homines contemplantur ipsum creatorem per ipsas creaturas. Insignita caractere, id est quodammodo sigillata signo. Character idem est quod signum: et ideo caractere apponitur⁸⁹ theophanie. Theophania dicitur a theos, quod est deus, et phanos, quod est visio sive contemplacio: unde theophania, id est visio dei. Simplicis apponitur ad differenciam composite contemplationis; quia quedam contemplacio est simplex, quedam composita. Composita contemplacio etiam in duas dividitur species, in contemplacionem secundum sensum, et contemplacionem secundum rationem. Secundum sensum fit contemplacio, quando contemplantur deum creatorem per ipsas creaturas; scilicet per solem et per lunam et per stellas, et huiusmodi. Secundum rationem fit contemplacio, quando nos contemplantur coherenciam inter materiam et formam; unde scimus quod abunivit materiam et formam: et hec etiam contemplacio est composita, quia quedam compositio est materiei ad formam et forme ad materiam. Simplex contemplacio est que fit inter angelos, quia contemplantur deum prout est in maiestate sua, et non per aliquas creaturas. Non imaginarie apponitur, quia quedam contemplacio est imaginaria, quedam non. Imaginaria est illa contemplacio.

[The rest is wanting.]

⁸⁹ This word is repeated also after theophanie.

IV. NOTE ON THE PRECURSORS OF NOMINALISM.

APPEND. IV.

* Gesch. der logik im abendlande
2. 24-37; cf.
pp. 76 sq.

* Supra,
p. 321.

* Lib. v. 4 p.
229, ed. Gale.

* De la phil.
scol. i. 174
sq.; cf. pp.
118 sq.; hist.
de la phil.
scol. i. 246
sq.; cf. pp.
44 sq.

PROFESSOR VON PRANTL has undoubtedly the credit of being the first to 'explain how it was that John the Scot could be reckoned as the founder of nominalism, and to define the limits within which this ascription could be justly claimed. M Hauréau had indeed previously interpreted the reference in du Boulay's chronicle "already quoted, in the same sense as Dr von Prantl; but he was led to this conclusion by the help of a passage in the De Divisione Naturae which he misread in an inexplicable manner. John omits grammar and rhetoric from the class of strict sciences, because non de rerum natura tractare videntur, sed vel de regulis humane vocis, &c. * M Hauréau understood this of dialectic and rhetoric, and thus actually inverted the real significance of John's position in respect of the function of logic.

I may here notice the question raised by some commentaries attributed to Rabanus Maurus, which discover so close an affinity to John Scot's logical theory as to suggest that they are immediately derived from him⁶⁰. * Dr von Prantl, therefore, maintains that if genuine they can only be placed among Rabanus's latest productions, and argues strongly in support of the view that they have been wrongly attributed to him. I cannot say that Dr von Prantl's reasoning appears to me quite decisive, or that the conflict asserted to exist between the views contained in these glosses and in Rabanus's other works is so substantial as to be fatal to their common authorship. Nor do I think that Dr von Prantl has proved the impossibility of the former being independent of John Scot's influence.

The next symptom of a nominalistic tendency appears in certain glosses in a Paris manuscript (now numbered Fonds Latin 12,949), of which specimens are given by * Cousin

* Ouvr. inéd. d'Abél., intr.,
pp. lxxxii-
lxxxv notes;
append., pp.
619 sq.

⁶⁰ Extracts are printed by Victor Cousin, Ouvrages inédits d'Abé- lard, intr., pp. xvii, lxxviii, lxxix, and app., pp. 613 sqq.

and ^a M Hauréau. The latter, and before him ^b Charles de Rémusat, claimed their authorship for Heric of Auxerre. Dr von Prantl, on the contrary, ^c considers the major part to be by another, though contemporary, writer; and it will no doubt be conceded to him that no argument beyond that of date can be drawn from the similarity of handwriting,—there is nothing to show it to be autograph. But he goes too far when he clinches his conclusion by the statement that the codex itself gives a different author to one section of the glosses in dispute. It is true that the line,

Iepa hunc scripsi glossans utcunque libellum, stands in f. 52 b, but common sense, as well as prosody, compels us to look more closely before accepting this 'enigmatic name,' the bearing of which Dr von Prantl himself is unable even to guess at. As a matter of fact, Iepa, which Cousin had noted with a query (this ^d Dr von Prantl did not observe), is an interpolation. M G. Saize, the archivist and keeper of the palace library at Monaco, who kindly verified the point for me, states that the word is written in a hand of the fourteenth century, or even later, simulating the original character, upon an erasure the space of which it does not nearly cover. The word for which it is substituted, from the size of the erasure, may have been formed of seven or eight letters, and thus may perfectly have been Heiricus. There is therefore no testimony for or against Dr von Prantl's view to be extracted from the verse.

The logical summary found in a metrical version in another Paris manuscript, to which ^e Dr von Prantl refers, can hardly be admitted as material for the logical history of the time before Roscelin, until we are better informed about its date. Cousin, who prints these hexameters, ^f describes them as of the tenth or eleventh century, and hints the possibility that they were dedicated to a man who died in 1107. It is impossible, then, to assert

APPEND. IV.

^a De la phil.

scol. i. 136-

142; hist. i.

188-196.

^b Abélard i.

314 n.

^c l. c., pp. 42

sq.

^d P. 43 n. 164.^e Pp. 59 sq.^f Append.,

p. 647.

APPEND. V. that they are anterior to Berengar of Tours, or even to Roscelin. In any case their bearing upon the question at issue is of the slenderest importance.

V. EXCURSUS ON A SUPPOSED ANTICIPATION OF SAINT ANSELM.

I. SAINT ANSELM has been generally regarded as the first writer in the course of the middle ages who put forth a formal argument in favour of the existence of a God. Dr von Prantl, however, claims the priority for William abbat of Hirschau, and infers from the fact that William is known to have been in correspondence with Anselm, at a date anterior to the publication of his Monologium, that the latter derived from William the idea of framing the argument in question. Dr von Prantl's hypothesis is contained in a paper printed in the first part of the Sitzungsberichte der königlichen Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München for 1861; and his results on the particular point which I have stated are given in full in his «Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande».

§ Vol. 2. 83
sqq.

It should, however, be noticed that the two arguments to which attention is drawn are quite different, William's resting upon the design and orderly government of the universe, while Anselm's proceeds from the existence of relative good to that of an absolute Good; a reasoning which he subsequently exchanged for the simple proof that the being of God is implied in our thought of him. Besides, it is clear that the link sought to be established is at best a plausible conjecture: we have no evidence that the two men corresponded on the subject. Still it would be a sufficiently interesting coincidence if we could show that the first attempt among Christians during the middle ages to prove the existence of a God suggested itself to these two contemporaries.

2. Dr von Prantl goes a step further, and raises a presumption as to the source of the argument. It was borrowed, he thinks, by Constantine the Carthaginian, afterwards a monk of Monte Cassino, who died before the year 1072, together with the physical learning for which he was famous, during a scholar's life of near forty years in the Mohammadan east; and it is certain that the 'argument from design' appears in Arabian philosophy a century earlier⁶¹. The entire reasoning here too is of course conjectural, for there is no hint that the argument in question occurs in Constantine's writings. William, it is added, was in Rome in 1075, a few years after Constantine's death, and may then have made the acquaintance with the latter's books, which his own productions show him to have turned to good account. We have, however, no information as to the date at which William himself wrote the treatise which has given rise to all these æery presumptions; and an inquiry into the character of the treatise will soon persuade us that it is really later by a couple of generations than its supposed date, and only by an accident attributed to William of Hirschau.

3. The little volume of Philosophicarum et astronomicarum Institutionum Guilielmi Hirsaugiensis olim Abbatis Libri tres, which was printed at Basle in 1531, quarto, shows itself on the most cursory examination to be textually the same book with the Περὶ Διδάξεων sive Elementorum Philosophiæ Libri IV, printed among the works of ^h Bede in the Basle ^h Opp. 2. 311-343. edition of 1563, folio. This Περὶ Διδάξεων, however, although it is actually quoted as Bede's, and as a possible source of an opinion of Abailard, by so accomplished a scholar as ⁱ Charles de Rémusat, has been generally recognised as the work of William of Conches, certainly since the publication of ^k Oudin's Commentarius de Scriptoribus ^k Vol. 2. 1230.

⁶¹ See the passage cited in the Sitzungsberichte, ubi supra, p. 20, n. 55, from Dieterici, Die Natur-anschauung und Naturphilosophie der Araber im zehnten Jahrhundert, p. 162; Berlin 1861.

APPEND. V. Ecclesiasticis, and of the ¹twelfth volume of the Histoire litté-
¹ Pp. 457-462. raire de la France. As long ago too as 1838 Charles Jourdain pointed out that the work in question existed also in the twentieth volume of the Lyons' Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum under the title De Philosophia Mundi, and under the name of Honorius of Autun⁶²; and neither Jourdain nor any other writer (previous to Dr von Prantl) who had mastered the facts, with reference either to the Περὶ Διδάξεων or to the De Philosophia Mundi, had any doubt that their, or rather its, authorship belonged to William of Conches. Nor is manuscript authority wanting: it occurs, as Conches', to take a single example, in a manuscript of ^m University college, Oxford, nr vi p. 389, under the title Philosophiae Compendium. The fact, however, that the contrary hypothesis is supported by a scholar so distinguished for scrupulous accuracy as Dr von Prantl, and put forth by him with all the weight and dignity of Proceedings of an Academy of Sciences, even though he has failed to observe the identity to which I draw attention, seems to justify a renewed examination of the whole question, with the view of ascertaining whether the book already thrice obscured under the names of William of Hirschau, Bede, and Honorius of Autun, could by any possibility be by the first of the three. To begin with, it will be desirable to give a short comparison of the three recensions, which for convenience I shall cite as 'Hirschau,' 'Bede,' and 'Honorius,' premising that when I speak of identity I do not exclude divergences, often wide divergences, extending not only to the interchange of unimportant words, inflexions, &c., but also to the order

^m Coxe, catal.
 1. 3 a.

⁶² Jourdain claims the discovery in the Notices et Extraits des Manuscrits, 20 (2) 43, n. 1. The Histoire littéraire impartially describes the same work under the head both of Honorius (vol. 12. 178 sq.) and of William of Conches.

M Hauréau, Singularités historiques et littéraires 243, supposes that the original ascription of the work to Honorius by the editors of the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum was a mere guess: but they must surely have had some manuscript to go upon.

of words in a sentence, and even further; such, in fact, as one is prepared to find in works so carelessly reproduced as those of a medieval writer, not of the first rank, would naturally be. The proof that the work in question is actually by William of Conches I reserve for the following excursus.

4. As yet it has appeared that in each case the work bears a different title, and that in Hirschau it is divided into three books, while the others have four. I take as a point of comparison one which displays the greatest divergence between the three recensions, the manner, namely, in which quotations are introduced: I have chosen it because of the curious light it throws on the processes by which writings were adapted to different authors. The chapter-divisions, which are found only in Honorius, I have added for distinction in the margin.

HIRSCHAU 12.	HONORIUS : Max. Bibl. Patr. 20.	BEDE Opp. 2. 314.
	999 G, H.
ut ait Constantinus in Pantegm. voluit autem Constantinus.	ut ait Constantinus in Πατριάρχ. voluit autem Constantinus.	ut definiunt philosophi. volunt autem philosophi.
p. 14. Constantini nec alterius philosophi.	p. 1000 B, C. Constantini scripta nec alterius philosophi.	p. 315. philosophorum.
p. 15. Iohannitii.	Iohannicii.	philosophi.
p. 73.	p. 1017 G.	p. 340.
Quia vero hoc a Iohannitio [misprinted -tiu] satis dicta sunt.	Sed quia hoc a Iohannicio in Isagogis satis dictum est.	Sed quia hoc a physico in Isagogis satis dictum est.

From these five examples, which might easily be mul-

APPEND. V.

Lib. i. 21.

Lib. iv. 20.

APPEND. V. tiplied ⁶³, it is difficult to draw any other inference than that the writer of the manuscript from which Bede is printed, intentionally effaced what occurred to him as incompatible with the age of the presumed author ⁶⁴. He has, however, gone carelessly enough to work. After, for instance, changing Constantini into the plural philosophorum, he has left secundum eum immediately after: and in the last example given above he suppresses the name Johannitius, which indicates Honain ben-Isaac, a Jewish physician of the ninth century, while he leaves untouched the reference to this writer's ^p medical treatise known as the Isagoge, no doubt through an ignorant confusion with the work of Porphyry which exercised so signal an influence on the learning of the middle ages. It is in fact possible, though extremely unlikely, that the whole of these phaenomena is due in the first instance to an illiterate scribe who, in face of a difficult exemplar to copy from, preferred a vague expression to a guess that might prove wrong. Yet the citations of classical and sub-classical authors, some, one would say, less well known than Constantine, are as a rule correctly given. In a single one of the instances quoted by Dr von Prantl, a citation has been obscured in Hirschau, apparently in the interest of his authorship; it is suggested in Bede and is given fully in Honorius:

p v. Prantl,
p. 14 n. 35.

	HIRSCHAU 8.	HONORIUS p. 999 A.	BEDE 313.
¶ Lib. i. 15.	¶ Cuius expositio alias est.	Cuius expositionem si quis quaerat, in glossulis nos- tris super Pla- tonem inueniat.	Cuius exponere, si quis quaerat, in aliis nostris scriptis inueniet.

⁶³ There are at least two more in lib. i. 21. I have limited myself to the examples quoted from Hirschau by Dr von Prantl, because when I wrote this excursus I had not access to a copy of the book itself.

⁶⁴ M Hauréau, Singularités 238, has not noticed this peculiarity, and charges the editors with inadvertence in admitting a work as Bede's which contained references to later writers. As a matter of fact M Hauréau takes his quotations from Honorius.

The nature of this reference will appear in appendix vi. APPEND. V.
 § 7.

5. In regard to the comparative value of the texts of the three recensions of the treatise, Bede is, as may be inferred from what has been already said, on all accounts the worst⁶⁵; as a rule it is distinctly inferior to Hirschau, while the latter is perhaps slightly inferior to Honorius. None of the three editions, however, is complete. Hirschau breaks off first, just[†] after having introduced the subject of[‡] the soul, whereas Bede proceeds from that point for a[§] page and a-half further and Honorius a few sentences further still, the additional matter consisting of nearly twelve chapters in Honorius. This continuation is partly occupied with[¶] the soul, which, however, is only cursorily[‡] treated. The author then passes on to[§] the ages of man[¶] and their characteristics, and thus arrives at the subject of[¶] education. These last four chapters occur also in[¶] Hirschau, but at the beginning of the book, under the title of Aliquot philosophicae Sententiae. In the closing sentence of Bede, which also concludes the section prefixed to Hirschau, we read the following scheme of the order in which learning should proceed:

* Ordo vero discendi talis est ut quia per eloquentiam omnis[‡] fit doctrina, prius instruamur[¶] in eloquentia cuius sunt tres[‡] partes. . . . Initiandi ergo sumus in grammatica, deinde in dialectica, postea in rhetorica. Quibus instructi et ut armis muniti, ad studium philosophiae debemus accedere, cuius hic est ordo, ut prius in quadrivio, . . . deinde in divina pagina, quippe ut per cognitionem creaturae ad cognitionem creatoris perveniamus.

This in reality opens a new division of the author's whole subject; for, as Honorius continues, quoniam in omni

⁶⁵ In a few cases it contains good readings, as in p. 316, where com-mistio and coniunctio stand in an inverted order from that in Hirschau 18, thus rendering Dr von Prantl's emendation, p. 15 n. 39, superfluous.

⁶⁶ I correct from Hirschau.

[†] P. 77 (lib. iv. 30, Hon. p. 1019 c).

[‡] Lib. iv. 29-

[§] 34.
[¶] Capp. 35, 36.

[¶] Capp. 37-41.

[‡] Bede 343;
Honorius
1020 E, F.

APPEND. V. doctrina grammatica praecedit, it is his design to treat of grammar and, we may presume, of the other studies in

7 P. 1020 G. their order⁶⁷. 7 Sed quoniam, he concludes, de propositis supra . . . sectantes compendia diximus, ut animus lectoris alacrior ad caetera accedat, hic quartae partis longitudinem terminemus. The four books therefore are only a portion of the Philosophia, a fragment,—as ² Dr von Prantl himself rightly judged, with respect to Bede, from internal evidence, although his examination of the work was not sufficiently close to enable him to perceive that it was the same book which he had recently described at length before the Munich academy. A further indication of the uncertainty existing with regard to the limits of the book, appears in the fact already mentioned, that the concluding portion of Bede is actually contained in Hirschau in another place, namely, in the eight pages of Aliquot Philosophicae Sententiae, which are prefixed without pagination to his p. 1.

² De script. eccl. 148.

6. Hitherto I have assumed nothing with respect to the authorship of the work in question, although at the outset its absence from the list of William of Hirschau's works given by ^a Trittenheim, who, whatever his shortcomings, will be admitted to have had peculiar qualifications for knowing about the monastery of Hirschau, may seem to raise a presumption against its accuracy; not to speak of the surprise with which we find that most orthodox abbat credited with a theology betraying only too evidently the influence of Abailard. Leaving the larger subject for the following excursus, I have limited myself to an inquiry into the relations of three works, the identity of which had previously, as I thought, escaped detection. In this point I have since learned that I was mistaken. The identity manuscript containing other writings of William's (pp. 244 sqq.). I do not, however, think that such glosses will satisfy the language in the text.

⁶⁷ M. Hauréau, p. 242, takes it that William is referring to a commentary of his on Priscian, and identifies it with some anonymous glosses which he found in a Paris

was pointed out by Dr Valentin Rose in the Literarische Centralblatt so long ago as ^bJune 16, 1861. This very fact, however, makes a renewed examination the more necessary, since ^cDr von Prantl in his reply professed with remarkable courage his familiarity with the phenomenon of which Dr Rose and I charitably supposed him to be ignorant ⁶⁸, ignorance in so intricate a subject as the bibliography of William of Conches being a venial matter enough. It seemed indeed morally impossible for a scholar to describe at length a treatise which he knew to be textually identical with another work printed under a different name, and purporting to belong to a different century, without a word of allusion to the latter. This, however, Dr von Prantl declares that he has done, and it is needless to say more about the character of his defence. In the same letter he promised to justify his silence hereafter by a proof from two writings of William of Conches, the Dragmaticon and a Munich manuscript (no doubt, the Secunda Philosophia) that William had used the work of Hirschau. It is easy to prove, as the following excursus will show, that the Dragmaticon refers back to a previous book by the author; but I am curious to know how the existence of two identical works (this previous book and Hirschau's), merely on account of their bearing different titles in manuscripts, can be explained on the hypothesis of one having used the other. Nor does it appear that Dr von Prantl in the twenty-three years that have passed

APPEND. V.

^b Nr xxiv. col. 396.^c Ibid., nr xxvii. col. 444, July 6.

⁶⁸ Dr von Prantl alleges that in that very paper of his in the Munich Sitzungsberichte he did refer to William of Conches, and so could not be ignorant of his writings. This is true: he did refer (note 57) to him, but not to the work which is the subject of dispute, but to the Dragmaticon. This is as though a scholar charged with not knowing that the Historia pontificalis was by John of Salisbury, should reply that he had quoted the Policraticus; though the analogy is imperfect on account of the absence of any literary confusion in the latter case: it would be exact if the Historia pontificalis had been already published under different false names, and Dr von Prantl had written an article upon one of them and ignored the others. In the present instance his plea is worse than misleading.

APP. V, VI. since the date of his letter, has taken any steps to fulfil his promise.

The blunder, however, has survived, and Dr von Prantl's theory, according to a review by professor Wagenmann in the ^d Goettingischen gelehrten Anzeigen for 1865, is accepted bodily in M. Kerker's Wilhelm der Selige, Abt von Hirschau, published at Tuebingen in 1863. The reviewer repeats the whole story about William and Anselm and Constantine, which I have summarised in the foregoing pages, and ^e leaves the attribution of William's book in the category of facts not decisively established: the same position is taken up by ^f Dr Reuter. Dr Wagenmann, at the same time, argues very sensibly against the Hirschau theory on four grounds: (1) the difference of character between the book and William of Hirschau's genuine writings; (2) its resemblance to those of William of Conches; (3) a quasi-Sabellianism exactly like Abailard's; and (4) a doctrine of reconciliation and an argument for the existence of God most naturally presupposing Anselm's. He therefore infers a high probability for its being by William of Conches. But it is a pity that a mere blunder, because it happens to have been made by an eminent scholar, should be supposed on that account to affect a question of authorship which, as we shall see immediately, is as certain as any literary point can possibly be.

^d P. 1371.

^e Pp. 1373-1376.

^f Gesch. der relig. aufklärung im mittelalter i. 285 n. 4.

VI. EXCURSUS ON THE WRITINGS OF WILLIAM OF CONCHES.

1. THE number and attribution of the works of William of Conches have always been a standing puzzle in medieval bibliography. It has already been stated that the book which forms the subject of the preceding excursus, and which has been confused among the editions of the venerable Bede, William of Hirschau, and Honorius of Autun, is now generally ascribed to William of Conches. But it will be best to assume nothing about it until we have gathered sufficient evidence to warrant a certain conclusion. All William's productions hang so closely together that the proof that one of them is his involves all the rest: and if the following investigation goes over a good deal of ground which has already been covered by previous bibliographers, it does not in all points arrive at the same results as they have done. I have, in fact, the less hesitation in making it, since I hope by its means to throw new light upon several disputed facts in the literary history of the twelfth century, and to eliminate more than one error which could not have occurred if editors had been careful not to print fresh materials from manuscript before they had ascertained that they had been already published under a different title.

2. The book that may serve as a foundation for our inquiry is the Dialogus de Substantiis physicis ante annos ducentos confectus a Wilhelmo aneponymo philosopho, published in octavo at Strassburg in 1597⁶⁹. The editor, G. Grataroli, a Basle physician, who discovered the book in Italy, apparently at Padua, took it (as appears from the title-page) to be a composition of the fourteenth century: the internal evidence, however, is decisive on this head.

(a) The dialogue is held between the author and a certain dux Normannorum et comes Andegavensium, a style by which only two persons could possibly be designated. One is Geoffrey the Fair, the husband of the empress Matilda, from the year 1141 or earlier, until his death in 1151; the other is his son, our Henry the Second, from the latter date until his accession to the English throne. Henry, however, is excluded⁷⁰ by the mention of the education ¶ Praef., pp. 3 sq.

⁶⁹ This at least is the date that appears in the two copies of this very rare work that I have used, one in the stadtbibliothek at Zuerich and the other in the Bodleian library. It has been repeatedly given as 1566; see the Histoire littéraire de la France 12. 464, and Hauréau, Singularités historiques et littéraires 246.

⁷⁰ This, I see, is observed by M Hauréau, pp. 232 sq., who also APPEND. VI. of the duke's sons, since he only married in 1152. It may be observed that the belief that Henry was intended, combined with the old mistake which inferred from ^h John of Salisbury that William was about the year 1138 a teacher at Paris, plainly originated the fable which we read in ⁱ Oudin, that Henry the Second olim in curia regis Franciae enutritus et litteris in Parisiensi academia initiatus sub Guilhelmo fuerat.

^h Metalog. ii.
10 p. 804.

ⁱ Comm. de script. eccl.
2. 1231.

(b) The same passage which shows that Henry was not the interlocutor in the dialogue helps to fix the composition of the work within narrower limits. In te tamen, says William, et in filiis tuis aliquid spei consistit; quos non, ut alii, ludo alearum sed studio literarum, tenera aetate imbuisti: cuius odorem diu servabunt. The dialogue was written therefore some time, probably some years, before Henry was of an age to be knighted, in 1149; and we shall certainly not be far wrong if we place it about the year 1145.

3. The author describes himself at the opening of the sixth book:

^k Pp. 210 sq.

^k Ea autem quae a magistris, dux serenissime, multotiens audiavi, atque omnia quae recordatione usque ad meditationem memoriae commendavi, et ut firmitus verba retinerem (quae irrevocabilia volant) stili officio designavi, et iam quae per viginti annos et eo amplius alios docui, adhuc vix plene et perfecte intelligo, vixque intellecta propriis et apertis verbis explicare valeo: et unde mihi tam hebes ingenium, tam modica memoria, tam imperfecta eloquentia? an quia in patria vervecum ⁷¹ crassoque sub æere Nordmanniae sum natus? alios affirmare audio non solum minima, sed etiam maxima, quae notices the source of the idea that Henry was Conches' pupil at Paris; although I do not find that he disputes the story that John of Salisbury heard the latter there. Compare, however, above, p. 206 n. 6.

⁷¹ The edition reads Vernecum for vervecum, as though it were a proper name: the reference, however, to Juvenal, Sat. x. 49, 50, is obvious,

Summos posse viros et magna exempta duros

Vervicum in patria crassoque sub æere nasci.

M Hauréau had the right reading in his manuscript, which he translates 'la patrie des béliers,' p. 231.

nunquam a magistris audierunt, per se intellexisse, nihilque esse tam inusitatum, tam difficile, quod si sibi ostensum fuerit, statim non intelligant atque expedite alios doceant.

APPEND. VI.

The passage therefore tells us what William's native country was,—and we have only to add the concordant testimony of ¹all the known manuscripts of the work, which bear any title, to identify the place as a matter of certainty with Conches;—it tells us also the author's age, as having been a teacher since about 1120–1125, besides some other particulars about him to which we shall return hereafter.

¹ Cf. Hauréau, sing. hist. et litt. 246.

4. A piece of external evidence may serve to dissipate any remaining doubt as to the ascription of the dialogue. Walter of Saint Victor in his polemic against the opinions of Abailard, Gilbert de la Porrée, Peter Lombard, and Peter of Poitiers, written about the year 1180, expressly mentions, in his fourth book, William of Conches as having adopted the Epicurean doctrine of atoms: Quae forte Democritus cum Epicuro suo atomos vocat. Inde Willielmus de Conchis ex atomorum, id est, minutissimorum corporum, concretionem fieri omnia. The passage occurs among the copious extracts from Walter given by ^mdu Boulay, and the reference is to the dialogue i. pp. 25 sqq.:

^m Hist. univ. Paris 2. 659; cf. p. 743.

Sunt igitur in unoquoque corpore minima, quae simul iuncta unum magnum constituunt. Haec a nobis dicuntur elementa.

The interlocutor here objects, Ut mihi videtur, in sententiam Epicureorum furtim relaberis, qui dixerunt mundum constare ex atomis: to which the author replies, Nulla est tam falsa secta quae non habeat aliquid veri admixtum; sed tamen illud admixtione cuiusdam falsi obfuscatur. In hoc vero quod dixerunt Epicurei, mundum constare ex atomis, vere dixerunt: sed in hoc quod dixerunt, illas atomos sine principio fuisse, et diversas, permagnum et magne volitasse, deinde in quatuor magna corpora coactas fuisse, fabula est ⁷².

⁷² Dr Reuter verifies Walter's subject of the foregoing excursus, citation in that work which is the and which, for reasons that will

APPEND. VI.

5. It may then be accepted as fairly proved that the dialogue is by William of Conches; and it may be by this time convenient to select a name by which to distinguish it. Apparently in most manuscripts it is called the Dragneticon Philosophiae, 'dragneticon' being a synonym of 'dialogus.' Ducange quotes, sub voce, a sentence describing it as 'a work conducted by means of question and answer,' and ⁿDr Schaarschmidt, who does not profess to have seen the dialogue with which we are concerned, rightly corrects the title into Dramaticon. William, as it happens, himself explains the source of the title:

^a Joh. Saresb.
77 n. 1.

^o Praef., pp.
7 sq.

^o Sed quia, similitudo orationis mater est satietatis, satietas fastidii, nostram orationem dragnetice distinguemus. Tu igitur, dux serenissime, interroga: philosophus sine nomine ad interrogata respondeat.

The published dialogue was edited from a comparison of two manuscripts, one of which bore yet another title. The preface is headed 'Authoris Wilhelmi in suam Secundariam praefatio: nam hoc eius nomen fuit et haec libri inscriptio, ut ex antiquo exemplari constat.' Possibly therefore the printed title De Substantiis physicis is an insertion of the editor. From the Secundaria we pass to a fourth title, namely, Secunda Philosophia, which appears in two manuscripts of the staats- und hof-bibliothek at Munich. A fifth designation is found in a manuscript, nr xcv, of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, dating, according to Coxe's Catalogue, from the thirteenth century: 'Gulielmi de Conchis, alias Shelley, Universalis Philosophiae Libri III. per modum dialogi,' &c. Sixthly, in appear immediately, I shall cite simply as the Philosophia. He says, Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung in Mittelalter 2. 309 n. 28, that it occurs there in book i. ch. 21 (Honorius, pp. 999 G—1001 O); but in that passage there appears neither the reference to Epicurus nor the word 'atoms,' while both are found in the dialogue. The authors of the Histoire littéraire de la France, it may be added, were unable to find the reference in any of William's writings, vol. 12. 456. This is only one example of the reckless assertions which make that valuable store-house so dangerous to use without further inquiry.

one of the Digby manuscripts in the Bodleian library, nr cvii, the work is entitled Summa Magistri Willelmi de Conchis super naturalibus Quaestionibus et Responsionibus, &c. In the following pages I shall cite the book as the Dragmaticon. APPEND. VI.

6. We have now to inquire in what way it bears upon the other works of its author. Here its testimony is precise and unambiguous. It is a new edition of a former work entitled Philosophia, modified in concession, as would appear, to certain complaints on the score of heresy; and the passages thus altered or expunged are to be found in that work which in the preceding excursus was recognised under the different names of Bede, William of Hirschau, and Honorius of Autun. It is also known that ^{p v. supra, p. 129.} objections were raised to a work of William of Conches, entitled the Philosophia, which objections are substantially the same with those enumerated in the following paragraph of the Dragmaticon. I have inserted in the margin the corresponding places in the Philosophia.

After announcing the subject of his treatise William proceeds:

¶ Est tamen de eadem materia libellus noster qui Philosophia ^{¶ Praef., pp. 5 sq.} inscribitur, quem in iuventute nostra imperfectum, utpote imperfecti, composuimus; in quo veris falsa admiscuimus, multaue necessaria praetermisimus. Est igitur nostrum consilium, quae in eo vera sunt hic apponere, falsa damnare, praetermissa supplere. Falsa vero illa quae contra fidem catholicam nobis in eo videntur esse, ante auspiciū dictionis, nominatim damnare dignum duximus. Unde omnes qui illum habent libellum rogamus quatenus ea nobiscum damnent et exterminent. Verba enim non faciunt haereticum sed defensio.

¶ In illo diximus, in divinitate esse tria, potentiam, sapientiam, voluntatem: potentiam esse patrem, sapientiam esse filium, voluntatem spiritum sanctum. Sed quod dictum est de potentia quod sit pater, de voluntate quod sit spiritus sanctus, ^{¶ Cf. Philos. i. 6 (Bede opp. 2. 312; Honorius, max. bibl. patr. 20. 998 A).} etsi possit quoquo modo defendi, tamen quia nec in evangelio

APPEND. VI. nec in scripturis sanctorum patrum illud invenimus, propter illud apostoli damnamus, Prophanas novitates verborum devita. De sapientia quod sit filius, non damnamus, cum apostolus dicat Christum dei virtutem et dei sapientiam.

* Cf. ibid., cap. 8 (Bed. 312 sq.; Hon. 998 B, C).

⁸ In eodem conati sumus ostendere quomodo pater genuit filium, illudque quod dictum est, Generationem eius quis enarrabit? ideo esse dictum quod sit difficile, non quia impossibile: hoc iterum damnamus, et aliis damnandum esse pronunciamus.

† Cf. ibid., cap. 23 (Bed. p. 318; Hon. p. 1002 D).

[†] Cum in eodem de creatione primi hominis loqueremur, diximus deum non ex Adam vel ex costa foeminam fecisse, sed ex limo qui coniunctus illi fuerat, ex quo viri corpus plasmasverat; ideoque translative esse dictum quod ex costa Adae facta sit foemina: hoc iterum damnamus damnandumque iudicamus, sanctae et divinae scripturae consentientes quae ait quod immisso sopore in Adam tulit deus unam costam de costis eius, ex qua materialiter corpus mulieris plasmavit.

Haec sunt igitur quae in illo libro damnamus.

7. There is therefore no doubt that the early work of William of Conches to which reference is here made, is that same production which forms the subject of the preceding excursus and which, according to ^u Dr Wagenmann, actually bears the specific title of Philosophia Willihelmi Magistri in a Stuttgart manuscript⁷³. Of this the Dragmaticon is in fact a new edition, rewritten and cast in the form of a dialogue. The substantial agreement of the two has been already pointed out by professor Karl Werner in the ^x Sitzungsberichte der philosophisch-historischen Classe der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften at Vienna. This point being established it remains to apply the evidence thus obtained to clear up the other disputed facts in William's bibliography. One of these may be cursorily mentioned before we attack more serious difficulties.

^u Goetting. gel. anz., 1865, p. 1371.

^x Vol. 75. 309 sq.; 1873.

⁷³ The work also, according to M Hauréau, pp. 237 sq., bears the name of William of Conches in two Paris manuscripts; the titles added to the name, Tractatus Philoso- phiae and Philosophia are modern. M Hauréau, pp. 240 sq., takes the same argument as I have done from the Dragmaticon.

In the Philosophia i. 15, quoted ⁷ above, there is a reference to glossulis nostris super Platonem, a reference which ⁷ APPEND. VI. ⁸ Cousin easily discovered in a Paris manuscript of which he gives extracts. Knowing however only the Honorius-recension of the Philosophia, which is in its turn referred to as 'nostra Philosophia,' in the glosses in question, Cousin at once decided that the latter were by Honorius of Autun, because he failed to observe the identity of the presumed Honorius with that printed as Bede; which latter ⁸ he rightly attributed to William of Conches ⁷⁴. ⁸ P. 669. The glosses themselves are on the Timaeus, and abound in silent allusions to William's other works. Some of the definitions, those, for instance, of ^b philosophia and ingenium, occur verbally in the ^c Philosophia or the ^d Dragmaticon ⁷⁵. If these mutual references from each to each suggest a chronological puzzle, it is perhaps allowable to ascribe some of them to the ingenuity of copyists; but I am inclined to think that the quotation from the Dragmaticon is only apparent, and really comes from the Philosophia which ^e we have seen to be a fragment as we now have it. In this case the Philosophia and the Timaeus glosses may have been written about the same time and naturally contain cross-references.

To this same early date are evidently also assignable a set of annotations on Boëthius' Consolation of Philosophy ⁷⁶, of which extracts have been printed by ^f Jourdain, and which ^g the editor claims to be the first real Commentary, as distinguished from formal glosses, with the partial exception of that of Bruno of Corbio, devoted to the favourite author of the middle ages ⁷⁷.

⁷⁴ In his later edition, entitled Fragments philosophiques 2. 355, Cousin still only goes so far as to say that the glosses on the Timaeus 'pourraient bien être de Guillaume de Conches.'

⁷⁵ See other examples in Hauréau, p. 244.

⁷⁶ At least they contain a precise declaration of a doctrine which William may be presumed to have withdrawn with his other impeached errors. See the quotation, above, p. 173, n. 9.

⁷⁷ The manuscript which contains the glosses on the Timaeus includes

APPEND. VI.

⁷ APPEND. v.

⁸ 4.

⁸ Ouvr. inéd.

d'Abélard.

app., 646 sq.

⁸ P. 669.

^b Ibid., pp.

649, 651.

^c Lib. i. r

Bede. 312.

^d Lib. vi. p.

307.

⁸ APPEND. v.

⁸ 5.

^f Not. et extr. des manuscr.

20 (2).

^g P. 57.

APPEND. VI.

8. Two other works of William of Conches, the Secunda Philosophia and the Tertia Philosophia, are described in the twelfth volume of the Histoire littéraire de la France. They remain in manuscript at Paris; but specimens, some chapters at length, and tables of contents, are printed by ^h Cousin. The first, ⁱ we are told, is a dialogue on anthropology between a master and a disciple; the second, also a dialogue, is an abridgement of the author's system of cosmography, derived from the Philosophia. Had however Cousin been acquainted with the Dragmaticon he would probably have suspected that as the immediate source, and he would have found that D. stands not for discipulus but for dux, the duke of Normandy to whom the work is dedicated. Moreover these works are not abridgements at all. The one is a literal transcript of part of the Dragmaticon, the other is a set of disconnected extracts from it. The latter is taken from different parts of books ii.—vi., and leaves off just before the point from which the former is transcribed. Of course it is impossible to speak with absolute certainty from Cousin's specimens, but the following details of collation suggest a sufficiently plain inference ⁷⁸.

^h Ouvr. inéd. d'Abélard 670-677; Fragm. phil. 2. 391-400.
ⁱ Hist. litt. 12. 465.

a fragmentary commentary on Priscian, which M Hauréau, pp. 244 sq., conjectures is also by William. We need, however, a fuller account of its contents before accepting the attribution, and we have already seen reason, supra, p. 344 n. 67, for disputing one of the arguments by which M Hauréau endeavours to support his theory. At the same time, there is no doubt a preponderant probability in his favour.

⁷⁸ M Hauréau in his Singularités still clings to the idea of these works being independent productions. I have this disadvantage in the argument as compared with M Hauréau, that he had the manuscript before him while I have not. However, I may take leave to doubt whether this distinguished scholar had always the Dragmaticon itself before him. At least it is certain that every reference he makes to the Secunda Philosophia occurs, just as Cousin's do, in the Dragmaticon [e. g. ch. xviii. (Hauréau, p. 252) = Dr. p. 281; ch. xxx. (Hauréau, p. 252 n. 2) = Dr. p. 306]: and not in the fourth book of the Philosophia, as M Hauréau says (p. 241), nor anywhere else in that work. The substance may be there very possibly, though Cousin's excerpts contain much that is definitely not there; but the form is that of a dialogue, and this fact alone decides the point. M Hauréau speaks (p. 247) of the Dragmaticon as borrowing from the Secunda Philosophia; but when the smaller work is contained verbatim the Secunda Philosophia begins with the words Dicendum APPEND. VI. etc., which introduce the section on animals occupying the first part of the sixth book of the Dragmaticon. The extracts which Cousin gives represent with trivial variants the identical text of the corresponding passages in the Dragmaticon, and the order of the thirty-five chapters is exactly the same. The two copies end with the same words.

The Tertia Philosophia contains ten chapters of which Cousin has printed the first. An analysis of this shows the character of the book; it is simply a set of extracts from the Dragmaticon. I take the sentences as they follow. Dum . . . extra quem nihil est will be found in the Dragmaticon, ii. p. 41; Nota quod tempore Martii . . . moritur, ib. iv. pp. 123 sq.; Nota: dicit Constantinus . . . pes-, in lib. iv. pp. 127 sq.; Verbi gratia . . . iudica, in v. p. 128; Nota: in autumno . . . periclitantur homines, in the same page. Chapters ii.—ix. from their headings correspond to passages in the fourth and fifth books of the Dragmaticon; chapter x. to something near the beginning of the sixth. The extracts speak for themselves: the Tertia Philosophia is nothing more than a note-book of quotations from the Dragmaticon.

Each are the 'valuable fragments' from which later scholars have drawn. Beyond insignificant variations they add nothing to what was already printed in complete form in 1567⁷⁹. William's original works in the limits of scriptural citation) in the greater, we need be long in deciding which is original and which the extract. regard to the Tertia Philosophia M. Hauréau says little (p. 10) and does not seem to suspect correspondence with the Dragmaticon. There is therefore nothing in his addition to our information about the two books which induce me to alter my previous opinion respecting them. I have already stated, above

¹ Prantl, gesch. der logik im abendlande 2. 127 n. 94; cf. Werner, ubi supra, p. 311.

§ 5, that the title Secunda Philosophia is also borne by the complete Dragmaticon itself. The manuscripts thus entitled Dr Reuter described as containing an entirely different work from Cousin's Secunda Philosophia, Geschichte der religiösen Aufklärung 2. 309 n. 30. What he quotes however certainly exists in the printed Dragmaticon, and I make no doubt that had Dr Reuter read the manuscripts further he would have found all Cousin's extracts there, as I have

APPEND. VI. therefore (excluding his glosses) are now reduced to two :
 — the early Philosophia and the corrected edition of the same the Dragmaticon. Is there a third to be added ?

9. The literary historians speak of a Magna de Naturis Philosophia by William of Conches as having been printed in folio, without place or date, about the year 1474. It = Vol. 12. 457. was first described as in three volumes ; but the ^m Histoire littéraire de la France pointed out that this was a mistake (originated or repeated by Fabricius), and that the supposed third volume was really by Vincent of Beauvais. The explanation thus vaguely alluded to, is given in full by = Job. Saresb. ⁿ Dr Schaarschmidt, and its correctness will be obvious to anyone who opens the second volume of Vincent's Speculum naturale in the edition, s. l. aut a., presumed to have been printed at Strassburg in 1468 or 1473 (not in that of Nuremberg, assigned to the year 1483, and also in folio). There is, it is needless to say, no title-page ; but the volume opens, book xix. (after the table of contents) with an extract from William of Conches, headed conspicuously : De opere sextæ diei. Et primo de animalibus. Guilerinus de conchis. This is the very title which has been constantly repeated as William's by the ^o bibliographers, and which even M Hauréau ^p once sought to restore to the catalogue of William's writings⁸⁰.

* Cf. Denis, ann. typogr. supplém. 2. 544 nr 4716. Vienna 1789 quarto ; Hain, repert. bibliograph. 5605, vol. 1 (2) 1866, Stuttgart 1837. ^v De la phil. scol. 1. 289.

10. The Magna de Naturis Philosophia, omitting this supposititious third volume, is briefly described by the authors of the Histoire littéraire, who are, I believe, the latest wit-found them in the printed text. Moreover he misread Cousin, Ouvrages inédits d'Abélard, 669, and applied what the latter said of the Tertia Philosophia to the Secunda. Here he was no doubt misled by M Hauréau, who speaks, p. 241, of part of the Secunda Philosophia being borrowed directly from the Philosophia, book iv. The immediate source is incontestably the Dragmaticon, though the substance may often agree with that of the Philosophia. See preceding note.

⁸⁰ In correcting this mistake (which is repeated by cardinal Pitra, Spicileg. Solesm. 2. 188, Paris 1855 quarto), M Hauréau has fallen into a new one, in speaking, Singularités 236 sq., of the original as the Speculum historiale, in which what little is said about the sixth day of creation occurs in bk. ii. (misnumbered i.) ch. 38, and bk. xix. (opening with the history of Arcadius) does not begin a volume.

nesses to its existence. They speak of it, as ¹Oudin did, as APPEND. VI. an undated folio of about the year 1474; but they could ²Vol. 2. 1230. only find one volume, the second, remaining, and this was in the library of the college of Navarre. They state further that it contained little original matter, being mainly compiled by means of extracts from the fathers: and yet they regard it as the source from which (a) the Philosophia, (b) the Secunda Philosophia, and (c) the Tertia Philosophia, were successively abridged; a statement which has been repeated by ³Cousin and others. Even the accurate Hauréau, who ⁴Ouvr. inéd. d'Abél., app. 669. had the Dragmaticon before him, said in the first edition of his ⁵*Philosophie scolastique*, that the Secunda and Tertia ⁶L. c. Philosophia 'paraissent avoir été faits pour venir à la suite de celui que nous venons de nommer,' the Magna de Naturis Philosophia; 'si, toutefois,' he adds, 'ils n'en forment pas une partie.' 'It has further been asserted that the great work was largely used by Vincent of Beauvais in his Speculum naturale. But although I do not pretend to a minute acquaintance with the Speculum, I can state with confidence that all the extracts from William which I have met with there, are taken either from the Philosophia or the *Dragmaticon*⁸¹.

II. The character of the Magna de Naturis Philosophia, as given in the existing descriptions of it, is in itself such as to arouse suspicion. For if there is one peculiarity which distinguishes the known writings of William from most of those of his age, it is the comparative absence of patristic quotations. William's authorities are Plato and Aristotle, Cicero, Macrobius, Ptolemy, Galen, Constantine, etc.; he draws illustrations from Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal. But engaged as he was in the pursuit of natural philosophy and natural history, he had small occasion to quote the fathers, and his references to them seem limited, though I do not state this positively, to Augustin, ⁸¹ For instance in book xxxii. 77. Vincent cites the latter as 'Guilhermus de Conchis' without further specification, and then adds a quotation from the Philosophia as 'Ex libro de natura rerum.'

APPEND. VI. Ambrose, and Bede. In fact he expressly declares his independence, as a philosopher, of the fathers. In eis, he says, quae ad fidem catholicam vel ad morum institutionem pertinent, non est fas Bedae vel alieni alii sanctorum patrum (citra scripturae sacrae auctoritatem) contradicere: in eis tamen quae ad philosophiam pertinent, si in aliquo errant, licet diversum affirmare. This statement occurs in the "Dragmaticon," a work which we have seen to be scrupulously modified in deference to orthodox objections. It is therefore the less likely that, even before his plain-spoken Philosophia, William should have written a great philosophical work chiefly constructed of select passages from the fathers. Besides, if such be the nature of this Magna Philosophia, how can it contain the material which he subsequently, ex hypothesi, 'abridged,' so as to form the Philosophia as we know it? The latter, as I believe on account of this assumed chronological arrangement, the authors of the Histoire littéraire designate the Philosophia minor, a title, however, which they do not assert to be found in any manuscript or edition of it⁸². I believe further that the entire basis of their theory rests on a misunderstanding of a passage in John of Salisbury, on which I shall comment in the ensuing excursus.

12. I have spoken of the Magna de Naturis Philosophia on the authority of those who profess to have seen the book and who declare that it bears this title 'in most of the manuscripts.' As it has now entirely disappeared it might seem impossible to arrive at any certain conclusion about it; but since writing this and the foregoing excursus I have had the advantage of reading M Hauréau's admirable criticism contained in the eighth chapter of his *Singularités historiques et littéraires*⁸³, which, I think it may

⁸² It is worthy of notice that William excuses the imperfections of this book by the plea that, 'studiis docendi occupati, parum spacii ad scribendum habeamus,'

lib. iii. praef. (Bede. 2. 330; Hon., p. 1010 B). This is scarcely the way in which an author would speak of an abridgement.

⁸³ I have added in notes the be said, finally disposes of the whole matter. We cannot check the description of the printed book, but we can that of the manuscripts; and *M Hauréau is able to state positively that no such manuscript exists in France, nor to his knowledge elsewhere. Half the description therefore rests upon some confusion: is it not natural to draw the same inference about the remainder? M Hauréau accordingly conjectures (he does not of course put it forward as more than a conjecture) that the bibliographers mistook some other book, published about the same time and also in two volumes folio, for William of Conches'; and he plausibly suggests that the book in question is the De Universo of William of Auvergne. The precise identification may be wrong, but it may be considered practically certain that some blunder of this kind originated the whole theory which, it has already appeared, is so difficult to reconcile with the known facts about William of Conches.

VII. EXCURSUS ON THE INTERPRETATION OF A PLACE IN JOHN OF SALISBURY'S METALOGICUS, i. 24 pp. 784 sq.

1. WILLIAM OF CONCHES has been generally regarded as a teacher who abandoned the thorough and honest system of the school of Chartres in order to compete with the shallower and more pretentious masters of his day. The Histoire littéraire de la France illustrates this defection by the instance of his work, the Philosophia, which it supposes to be an abridgement of a previous book, the very existence of which the preceding excursus has shown to be more than doubtful. 'Ce qui l'engagea,' we are told, 'de composer cet abrégé, ce fut vraisemblablement l'envie de se conformer, ou plutôt la nécessité où il se trouva de céder au torrent des points in which M Hauréau's conclusions agree with mine, and a single instance in which we differ. His essay, I have lately found, is in the main an enlargement of his article on William in the twenty-second volume of the Nouvelle Biographie générale, pp. 667-673; 1858.

APPEND. VII. philosophes de son temps, qui décrioient la prolixité de leurs prédécesseurs, et se piquoient de donner toute la philosophie en deux ans. Car il est certain par la témoignage de Jean de Sarisbéri, qu'après avoir longtemps résisté à ces sophistes, il se laissa entraîner par leur exemple, pour ne pas voir désertir son école.' The same statement involves also the character of William's colleague, Richard l'Évêque, and is accordingly repeated under his article in the *fourteenth volume of the Histoire. It has become the accepted view in regard to William, and is adopted, to give a single instance, in *Ritter's Geschichte der Christlichen Philosophie. It is therefore the more necessary to subject the hypothesis to a close examination⁸⁴. The part of it, however, concerning the sequence of William's works needs no refutation, since it is directly contradicted by his own ^bstatement that he wrote the Philosophia in his youth, some fifteen years perhaps before John of Salisbury came in contact with him.

* P. 216.

* Vol. 3. 395
n. 3.

^b Supra,
append. vi.
§ 6.

2. John of Salisbury's words are as follows :

Ad huius magistri [Bernardi Carnotensis] formam praeceptores mei in grammatica, Gulielmus de Conchis et Richardus cognomento episcopus, officio nunc archidiaconus Constantiensis, vita et conversatione vir bonus, suos discipulos aliquandiu informaverunt. Sed postmodum, ex quo opinio veritati praeiudicium fecit et homines videri quam esse philosophi maluerunt, professoresque artium se totam philosophiam brevius quam triennio aut biennio transfusuros auditoribus pollicebantur, impetu multitudinis imperitae victi, cesserunt. Exinde autem minus temporis et diligentiae in grammaticae studio impensum est, etc.

The language is no doubt ambiguous, and everything hangs on the sense we give to cesserunt. We may under-tiques 209; but he does not seem to be aware of the difference of opinion that has arisen on the point.

⁸⁴ The only writer I have found who interprets the passage of John of Salisbury as I do, is M Léon Maître, Écoles épiscopales et monas-

stand the passage, 'Once they taught well, but after a while they yielded to the rush of incompetent rivals and followed their example;' or equally legitimately, 'Once these worthy successors of Bernard handed on his tradition, but after a while, disgusted with the prevalent method of teaching, they withdrew from the field.' The words will bear either rendering; but John of Salisbury's other evidence about his masters, as well as the incontrovertible language of William of Conches' own writings, can only be reconciled with the second alternative: the first is altogether excluded by the known facts about William and Richard.

3. Taking first the testimony to be drawn from John of Salisbury's writings, we find that Richard l'Évêque remained through life a valued correspondent of his, and ^c was consulted by him on exactly those points of scholarship on which, if Richard's career be as is commonly supposed, John would be the least likely to trust him. William of Conches died before John had become conspicuous in the learned world, but John's recollections of his master are uniformly honourable. ^d He couples William's name with those of Gilbert de la Porrée, Abailard, and others of his most respected teachers, just by virtue of William's steady hostility to the empty-headed 'crammers' of his day. John also speaks of the jealousy which William and his friends excited in the latter; but of secession in consequence of it there is not a word.

4. It is precisely to these envious detractors that William constantly alludes in the prefaces to that Philosophia which, according to the Histoire littéraire, he condensed in deference to their opinion. The evidence of the prefaces to books i., ii., and iii. bears directly on the point; that of the two former, which I quote, is especially pertinent:

• Multos tamen nomen magistri sibi usurpantes, non solum hoc agere sed etiam aliis sic esse agendum iurantes, cognoscimus, nihil quippe de philosophia scientes, aliquid se nescire

APPEND. VII.

^c Schaar-
schmidt 77, 121.

^d Metalog. i.
5 P. 745.

• Philos. i.
præf. (Hon.
p. 995 F, G).

APPEND. VII. confiteri erubescences, sive imperitiae solatium quaerentes, ea quae nesciunt nullius utilitatis minus cautis praedicant.

[†] Lib. ii.
praef. (Hon.
p. 1002 H, Bed. 319).

[†] Quamvis multos ornatum verborum quaerere, paucos veritatem scire [al. scientiae] cognoscamus, nihil tamen de multitudine sed de paucorum probitate gloriantes, soli veritati insudamus.

Another passage answers the allegation of the Histoire littéraire in a curiously exact manner. Speaking of the duties of a teacher, William says:

[¶] Lib. iv. 37
(Hon. p. 1020
c, Bed. 342).

[¶] Sed si amore scientiae ad docendum accesserit, nec propter invidiam doctrinam subtrahet; nec ut aliquid extorqueat, veritatem cognitam fugiet; nec si deficiet multitudo sociorum, desinet; sed ad instructionem sui et aliorum vigil et diligens erit.

These quotations, I repeat, are taken from a work which, we are asked to believe, was shortened in concession to the rage for short and easy methods.

5. At a considerably later date William wrote the Dragmaticon, and in this the protests against the fashionable tendency are if possible stronger than in the Philosophia. One ironical reference to the author's constitutional dulness and incapacity to understand things after long thought, which his pretentious rivals professed to grasp in a moment, has been ^b already quoted. ⁱ In another he complains of the way in which the teachers of his time have lost credit among their scholars. Both he says are in fault; for to establish confidence one needs two things, knowledge and uprightness:

^b Supra,
append. vi.
§ 3.
ⁱ Dragm.,
praef., pp.
1 sqq.

Quia igitur omnes fere contemporanei nostri sine his duobus officium docendi aggrediuntur, causa sunt quare sibi minus credatur. Discipuli enim culpa non carent, qui relictæ Pythagoricae doctrinae forma (qua constitutum erat discipulum septem annis audire et credere, octavo demum anno interrogare), ex quo scholas intrant, antequam sedeant, et interrogant, imo (quod deterius est) iudicant; unius vero anni spacio negli-genter studentes, totam sapientiam sibi cessisse putantes, arreptis ab ea panniculis, vento garrulitatis et superbiae pleni, pondere rei vacui abeunt: et cum a suis parentibus vel ab aliis audiuntur, in verbis eorum parum aut nihil utilitatis perpenditur; statimque quod hoc solum a magistris acceperint, creditur unde magistri autoritas minuitur. AR. VII, VIII

6. It is perhaps not extravagant to assert that the words of John of Salisbury, as I construe them, read precisely as an echo of what we now find to have been the consistent attitude towards learning and teaching maintained by William alike in his earliest and in his latest works; but it is right to add that I was led to my interpretation of the passage in dispute, from a comparison of John of Salisbury's different references to William of Conches and Richard l'Évêque, and before I had entered upon the examination of William's own writings. The convergence of the double testimony is too exact to need insisting upon further; but I may venture to doubt whether the common view which I combat would ever have been suggested, far less accepted, had the historians of medieval literature taken the trouble to acquaint themselves personally with the books they describe.

VIII. NOTE ON ABAILARD'S MASTERS.

THE manuscript of Saint Emmeram's, Ratisbon (now at Munich), from which Pez printed Abailard's Scito te ipsum and Rheinwald more recently the same writer's Sententiae or epitome of theology, contains a notice of his biography to which, it seems to me, sufficient attention has not been directed. We must observe first that the character of the works in the volume is such as to mark it as proceeding from the inner circle of Abailard's disciples: for the Scito te ipsum had the reputation at least of being peculiarly esoteric, in fact, like the Sic et non, of shunning the

APP. VIII. light⁸⁵; and the Sententiae may be nearly certainly accepted as the * lecture-notes of a pupil. The presumption therefore is that the biographical record which accompanies these pieces is based upon special sources of information. Unfortunately a part of it is so evidently apocryphal, that critics have not unnaturally regarded it as altogether unworthy of consideration. It runs as follows:

¹ Cf. Deutsch, Peter Abälard 453-456.

¹ Thes. anecd. noviss. 3. disert. isagog. p. xxii.; 1721.

¹ Petrus, qui Abelardus, a plerisque Baiolardus, dicitur, natione Anglicus, primum grammaticae et dialecticae, hinc divinitati operam dedit. Sed cum esset inaestimandae subtilitatis, inauditae memoriae, capacitatis supra humanum modum, auditor aliquando magistri Roscii, coepit eum cum exfestucatione quadam sensuum illius audire. Attamen imperavit sibi ut per annum lectionibus ipsius interesset. Mox ergo socios habere, et Parisius palam dialecticae atque divinitatis lectiones dare coepit; et facile omnes Franciae magistros in brevi supervenit. Qui cum de Quadrivio nihil audisset, clam magistro Tirrico in quasdam mathematicas lectiones aures dabat, in quibus supra quam aestimaret obtentu difficultatis intellectus resilliebat audientis. Cui semel afflicto et indignantem per iocum magister Tirricus ait, Quid canis plenus nisi lardum baiare consuevit? Baiare autem lingere est. Exinde Baiolardus appellari coepit. Quod nomen tanquam ex defectu quodam sibi impositum cum abdicaret, sub litteratura non dissimili Habelardum se nominari fecit, quasi qui haberet artium apud se summam et adipem.

Taking these statements in order, we remark—

1. That the natione Anglicus, Britannus having been obviously changed into an apparent synonym, gives the

⁸⁵ Sunt autem, ut audio, adhuc alia eius opuscula quorum nomina sunt, Sic et non, Scito te ipsum, et alia quaedam, de quibus timeo ne, sicut monstruosi sunt nominis, sic etiam sint monstruosi dogmatis: sed, sicut dicunt, oderunt lucem nec

etiam quaesita inveniuntur: Epist. Guill. de S. Theod. ad Gaufr. et Bern., (Bern. Opp. 1. 303 B, ep. cccxxvi. 4. ed. Mabillon). The Sententiae are coupled with the Scito te ipsum by Bernard, Ep. clxxxviii. 2, p. 181 E.

impression of the writer being but remotely acquainted with Abailard's history. APP. VIII.

2. On the other hand, the order of his studies is correctly given. We have, it is true, no information about the time when Abailard learned grammar and we have to admit the probability that the writer merely conjectured that Abailard followed what was after all the natural and customary curriculum.

3. But the mention of Roscius (though the corrupt form in which the name is given may be considered to tell both ways) is of distinct importance. For a long time this passage was the only one, besides the notice of ^m Otto of Freising, that spoke of Abailard's personal relations with Roscelin; and Otto's testimony was ⁿcommonly discredited, especially because Abailard in his Historia Calamitatum altogether ignored the fact. So soon however as Abailard's Dialectic was printed, it was found that he was in all probability the person referred to under the abbreviated style of ^o magistri nostri Ros. The discovery in a Munich manuscript of a ^p letter unquestionably addressed by Roscelin to his former pupil (though here the names are indicated only by initials), has finally decided the matter, and to this extent confirmed the evidence of the record here under consideration.

^m Gest. Frider. i. 47. Pertz 20. 376.

ⁿ Hist. litt. de la France 9. 359 (1750), 12. 87.

^o Cousin, ouvr. inéd. d'Abél. 471.

^p Abael. opp. 2. 792-803, ed. Cousin.

4. The next point, namely, that Abailard was unversed in the arts of the quadrivium is also of importance, since it is incidentally corroborated by Abailard's own statement that he was ignorant of mathematics: after quoting a geometrical argument from Boëthius, he adds, ¶ Cuius quidem solutionis, etsi multas ab arithmetici solutiones audierim, nullam tamen a me praeferendam iudico, quia eius artis ignarum omnino me cognosco.

^q Dialect. p. 182.

5. Then follows the story of his attendance upon the lectures of master Tirric. After what ^r we have said about Theodoric or Terric of Chartres, it is natural that we should ^r Supra, pp. 115 sq.

APP. VIII. be disposed to identify him with this teacher of mathematics, especially since Tirric is found among the audience at Abailard's trial at Soissons. But what raises this conjecture to a higher degree of probability is the circumstance that the extracts which *M Hauréau has recently printed from an unpublished traité by Theodoric, show an evident partiality for mathematical illustrations. The account then of Abailard's connexion with Tirric suits exactly with what we know from other sources of these scholars' attitude towards mathematics.

* Hist. de la phil. scol. 1.
397 n. 1, 402
n. 1.

6. The concluding story about the origin of the name Abailard is of course a figment. Apart from its grotesqueness and intrinsic improbability (especially when we remember that, on the narrator's showing, Abailard must have adopted a new name after he had acquired his remarkable reputation as a teacher), there is sufficient evidence that the name is not unique. A little before Peter Abailard's birth, a son of Humphrey the Norman and nephew of Robert Wiscard received the name of Abaielardus.

† Rob. de Monte a.
1129, Pertz
6. 489.

7. Dismissing this legend then, we find that our document names two of Abailard's teachers, one of whom (though the name is corrupted) points to an established fact, and the other to one inherently probable. The chronology however presents serious difficulties. There is no interval after Abailard entered upon the study of theology in which we can plausibly insert the lessons he had from Tirric, who, so far as we know, taught only at Chartres; so that I incline to believe that Abailard made a short stay at Chartres during his first years of student life, after he left Roscelin and before he reached—possibly on his road to—Paris; or at the latest "during the period for which, suffering from ill-health or the hostility of William of Champeaux, he retired from the neighbourhood of Paris. However this may be, I see no reason for doubting the truth of the bare fact that Abailard did enter upon a course of learning under Tirric.

‡ Supra, p.
139.

IX. NOTE ON THE SECOND PREFACE TO GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE'S COMMENTARY ON BOËTHIUS.

1. * JOHN OF SALISBURY states that after the events of APPEND. IX. the council at Rheims Gilbert continued to suffer from the injury then done to him by those who sought to convict him of heresy, and took means to vindicate his position. * Hist. pontif. xiii. Pertz-20. 527. Scriptis ergo postea contra illos alterum prologum in expositionem Boëthii sui, in quo quosdam, videlicet emulos suos, asserit sic hereticorum vitare nomina, ut tamen errores eorum sequantur et doceant. The date of this new preface is certain not only from the words of John just quoted, but also from the fact that according to John's account it was addressed to the capitula or articles of faith which were only produced by saint Bernard at Rheims. It therefore forms a sort of summing-up of the case from Gilbert's side, but was written for his own satisfaction at some time after the controversy had come to an end.

2. This preface seems to have disappeared, but an important fragment of it has lately been brought to light by professor Usener of Bonn, in the fifth volume of the Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie for 1879. The editor's estimate of his discovery is however exaggerated by a singular and almost inexplicable oversight. A great part of what he prints has in fact been published for over three hundred years, and stands in the very edition of Boëthius which Dr Usener had before him (that of Basle, 1579), at the beginning of the Books on the Trinity. * Dr Usener says, 'Each of the four commentaries has its introduction; and although that to the first treatise De Trinitate is more extensive than the following ones, it is not more general in its character but is concerned with discussions raised by Boëthius' text:' this is the preface beginning, * P. 185.  Omnium quae rebus percipiendis suppeditant rationum.* But, * Boëth. 1128. says Dr Usener, in a Vatican manuscript (Lat. 560) of the thirteenth century we find further Item alius prologus,

APPEND. IX. and this also appears in a manuscript of Saint Victor. It was written, ^b he thinks, for a second edition of Gilbert's Commentary, after the council of Paris and thus presumably in preparation for that of Rheims. The hypothesis is no doubt possible, but it is curious that Dr Usener should be unacquainted with John of Salisbury's account, with which it is certainly natural to combine or identify this 'new preface.' It is more curious that the editor should not have observed that this very preface, only in a briefer form, is to be found in the ^c printed edition, prefixed not to the Commentary but to the treatise of Boëthius itself. The preface is therefore not a new one, but only an enlarged edition of that identical 'general preface,' the supposed absence of which puzzled Dr Usener, as we have seen above.

^c Boëth. 1119.

3. The new part is however of sufficient interest to be transcribed here, especially because when printed in the midst of a mass of old matter its importance does not immediately attract attention. It is inserted, after the words scriptoribus recedamus, before the concluding sentence, exactly where we should expect such an addition to be made; and it runs as follows:

^d Jährb. pp. 187 sq.

^d Quamvis nos ab eis dissentire garriant quidam fennii atque preconii, qui cum nichil didicerint, opinione sua nesciunt nihil, homines sine ratione philosophi, sine visione prophete, preceptores impossibilium, indices occultorum, quorum mores plurimis notos describere nil nostra interest. Ipsi vero tanquam excussi propriis aliena negotia curant et obliti suorum satiras satirorum [sic] de ceteris animi ingenio et vite honestate preclaris multarum personarum fingunt comedias. Qui etiam in Deum blasphemi illos de ipso profitentur errores quorum nomina diffitentur. Nam, ut ita dicatur, hereticorum catholici in Sabellii, Donati, Pelagii, et aliorum huiusmodi pestilencium verba iurati, horum nomina (eo quod edictis publicis dampnata noscuntur) cum catholicis detestantur, ut cum blasphemiarum caussis sint iuste dampnabiles, blasphemorum detestatione putentur indempnes: sed quia non tam res nominibus quam APPEND. IX. nomina rebus accommodat impositio, quibuscunque res conveniunt, nomina non convenire non possunt. Quoniam vere sunt, recte vocantur, Sabelliani, Donatiste, Pelagiani, et huiusmodi. Et bene quod novi heretici nil afferunt novi, ut ad improbandum adinventiones novas novis sit laborandum inventis. Antiqua sunt dogmata, olim per preclari et exercitati ingenii viros evidentissimis atque necessariis rationibus improbata, quibus eadem novissimis his rediviva temporibus possunt refellere, quicumque recte intelligentes virorum illorum scriptis lectitandis invigilant. Sed qui neque legunt neque lecturiunt, ideoque scientiarum elementa, si qua prioribus annis attendere consueverant, post longa desuetudine desciverunt aut etiam corruptis artibus a via veritatis exorbitaverunt, has omnino rationes ignoraverunt. Quorum si forte aliqui humano errore aut potestate aliqua presunt aut preminent dignitate, precipiunt ut verum falsum et falsum verum, iterumque bonum malum et malum bonum esse credatur: et quod impudentissimum est, ad sui magnificenciam quoslibet infames magnificant et magnificos infamant. Sed quia non tam cognitores quam cogniti resident, sepe contingit ut rerum consequentibus cancellatis cuiuspiam boni fame aliquid illorum favor detrahat et vituperatio addat. Quod nimirum attendentes, illorum maledicta de nostris moribus et precepta de rebus contempnimus. Nam neque mores nostros convictu neque rerum proprietates disciplina noverunt.

Then follows the concluding sentence of the printed edition, whose text I retain, appending the two variants that occur in Dr Usener's copy:

Quae ^e autem a nobis scripta sunt bene exercitatis lectoribus ^{vero, Usener.} non modo rationibus firma, verum etiam scripturis autenticis adeo consona esse videntur ut nostra non tam inventa quam ^f furta esse credantur. ^{f firma? U.}

4. The personal reference of the added passage is exactly in the same spirit as that answer which ^{§ v. supra p. 193.} John of Salisbury reports Gilbert to have given when Bernard

APP. IX, X. suggested an interview. It is also a valuable specimen of the language which could be used about the saint by neither an insignificant nor an irreligious section of his contemporaries. But the addition to the preface, although partly agreeing closely with what John of Salisbury says about the 'new preface,' does not cover the whole ground which he describes. Either therefore the new preface itself has disappeared, or rather been curtailed to its present dimensions, or else John has mixed up with his account of it reminiscences of his conversations with Gilbert on the subject, reminiscences perhaps of his master's former lectures, or even his own independent vindication of Gilbert derived from a study of the Commentary on Boëthius. But between these alternatives it would be probably rash to decide.

X. NOTE ON CLARENBALD OF ARRAS.

CLAREBALDUS, archdeacon of Arras, is named in the continuation of ^b Henry of Ghent, just after Peter Lombard, as having written a commentary on the books of Boëthius On the Trinity, in which he argued against certain opinions of Gilbert de la Porrée, condemned Abailard, and favoured saint Bernard. In the ¹*Gallia Christiana* he appears as holding the office of provost of the church of Arras in 1152 and 1153; and since his successor emerges in the year 1160, it is presumed that he died before that date. His commentary should therefore offer valuable contemporary evidence in regard to the controversies spoken of in my sixth chapter; but the ²*Histoire littéraire de la France* says it is 'non imprimé et peut-être perdu.' It exists, however, among the manuscripts of Balliol college, Oxford, curiously enough in the very same volume, cod. cexevi, which contains some of Abailard's most treasured writings⁸⁶. I have

^b Henr. Gandav. de script. eccl., app., cap. 10; Mirae. Bibl. eccl. 174.

¹ Vol. 3. 355 A, ed. Piolin, 1876.

² Vol. 12. 445.

⁸⁶ Among them the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans which Cousin stated to be found in no known manuscript, although he had a portion of this very volume transcribed for him for another work of Abailard.

not had leisure to give the work more than a cursory examination. But the following notes will not be without interest. APPEND. X.

The Commentary was written after August 1153, since it speaks of ‘iocunde recordacionis abbas Bernardus. We learn also from it that the author—his name is here spelled Clarenbaldus—was a disciple of Hugh of Saint Victor, and of Theoderic the Breton, whom ^m we have seen reason ^m to believe was chancellor of Chartres : ¹ f. 198.
^m Supra, p. 115.

ⁿ Has causas mihi aliquantulum pertinaciter investiganti = f. 190 b. doctores mei venerabiles, Hugo videlicet de Sancto Victore et Theodericus Brito reddidere. Magister vero Gillebertus Pictavensis episcopus verbis perplexis hanc causam reddit. Que tametsi dispendiosa videri possunt, tamen in medium proferam, ne tam clarum doctorem cum famosis doctoribus ascribere videar invadere.

He therefore writes his criticism on Gilbert with the object, in part, of showing that his judgement of him is not influenced by any grudge against including the illustrious doctor in the same class with the famous doctors first named ; so I understand the concluding words of the quotation. He charges Gilbert, as ^o so many others did, with an excessive obscurity of style : ^o Cf. supra, pp. 182, 186 sq.

^p Exemplum huius lucidissime planitie magister Gillebertus p f. 204. Pictavensis episcopus multo verborum circuitu tenebrosam obscuritatem inducit, liberatque verbis rem frivolum involventibus, ut credatur, etc.

Clarenbald even finds fault with Gilbert's logic, speaking of him as ‘falsum sibi in logica fingens, aut certe male intelligens principium, quod est hoc, etc. But the strongest passage I have found against Gilbert is one in which he describes some views of his as expressly heretical and as having been condemned at the council of Rheims :

^r Ex hoc loco episcopi Pictavensis error ortus esse videtur, ut tres personas numero differentes esse assereret. . . . Ergo nec numero

APPEND. X. tres persone inter se differunt. Quum vero in concilio Remensi sub Eugenio papa super aliis rebus liber eius reprehensus dampnatusque tam scolarium lectionibus quam claustralium ademptus est, et hic error, utpote heresibus eius aliis nullo modo preferendus, ibi commemoratus non est, commodum mihi visum est verba quibus hunc ipsum locum pertransire voluit, in medium revocare.

With respect to Abailard Clarenbald's language is still more hostile; he accuses him of virtually resuscitating the opinions of Arius :

• f. 197 b. ^sEandem pene heresim Petrus Abailardus nostris diebus, longo sopore antiquatam, renovavit; cum spiritu iactancie et impietatis plenus, divinitati ignominiam inferre, sibi gloriam conatus est parare.

INDEX OF NAMES.

- Abailard, Peter, 136-175, 363-366; cf. 24 n. 2, 57, 109-112, 115, 202 sq., 326, 370, 372: his influence on William of Conches 125, 167, 173; cf. 344, 346: comparison with Gilbert de la Porrée 180 sq., 184 sq.; cf. 134 sq.: his posthumous reputation 194-200. ~~cf. 372.~~
- Adam du Petit Pont bishop of Saint David's 208 sq.; cf. 186, 187 n. 20.
- Adelman bishop of Brescia 113 n. 5.
- Agobard, saint, 38-50; cf. 33 n. 16.
- Alberic of Paris, archdeacon of Rheims, 203 sqq.
- Alberic of Rheims, pupil of Anselm of Laon, 145, 149, 151; cf. 203 n. 4.
- Albinus, apparently a Scot, 17 n. 17.
- Alcuin 17 sq., 20-23.
- Alfred, king, and foreign scholars, 56, 313-328.
- Amalric of Bène 77.
- Ambrose, saint, his tradition at Milan, 94 sq.
- Anastasius the librarian 36, 56 n. 3, 320.
- Anselm, saint, 104 sqq.; cf. 65, 338 sq.
- Anselm of Bisate, the Peripatetic, 81 sq.
- Anselm of Laon 111 sq.; cf. 133, 135, 143 sqq.
- Aristippus, Eusebius [Henricus], his translation of Plato, 172 n. 7.
- Aristotle, his influence on medieval writers, 1, 142, 222, 239 sq., 266-269, 283, 297; cf. 225, 295, 311 sq.
- Arnold of Brescia 162, 247.
- Arnulf bishop of Orleans 87 n. 9, 89 n. 12.
- Asser, bishop of Sherborne, criticism of, 313-316, 320-329.
- Athelney, abbey of, 314 sqq., 321, 323 sq., 328 sq.
- Augustin, saint, his influence on medieval writers, 30, 34, 49 sqq., 174 sq., 293.
- Bacon, Roger, 312 sq.
- Bale, John, bishop of Ossory, his story about John the Scot, 311 sqq.
- Bartholomew bishop of Narbonne 42.
- Becket, Thomas, saint, 214 sq.; cf. 189, 202.
- Bede 12, 19-21, 155, 358: work attributed to, 130, 339-344, 346, 351.
- Benedict Biscop 19.
- Benevento, superstition at, 43.
- Berengar of Tours 98 sq., 101 sqq.; cf. 34 n. 17, 76, 113, 140.
- Bernard, saint, of Clairvaux, 183 sq.; cf. 196, 198: his relations with Abailard 157, 161-166, 184 sq., 188; with William of Conches 129; and with Gilbert de la Porrée 133 sqq., 184-194, 367-370.
- Bernard Sylvester of Chartres, bishop of Quimper, 113-126; cf. 133, 134 n. 31, 135, 170, 206, 360 sq.
- Bobbio, abbey of, 15.
- Boethius 118, 353; cf. 179, 367, 370.
- Bogomiles 93.
- Bois, Peter du, 256-262.
- Boniface VIII 256 sq.
- Bonizo bishop of Sutri 246 n. 19, 252.
- Bruno, saint, archbishop of Cologne, 85 sqq.
- Camin, saint, 12.
- Cassiodorus 7, 171 n. 6.
- Charles the Bald 56 sq., 74 sq., 318.
- Charles the Great, his promotion of learning, 15-18; fiction of the translation of the empire by, 250 sqq.
- Chartres, school of, 88, 112-135, 206-209; cf. 169, 360 sqq.

- Chiersey, council of (849), 53.
 Clarenbald archdeacon of Arras 370 sqq.
 Claudius of Turin 28-38; cf. 25 n. 23: compared with Agobard 38 sq., 49: his allegorical treatment of Scripture 46; cf. 30 n. 8.
 Clement, a Scot (744), 22 sq.
 Clement the Scot (temp. Charles the Great) 16.
 Colonna, Aegidius, 255 n. 27.
 Columban, saint, 13-15.
 Constantine, donation of, 249 sq., 254, 257, 261.
 Constantine the Carthaginian 339, 341 sq.
 Dante de Monarchia, 262 sq.
 Dionysius the Areopagite, saint, writings attributed to, 57 sq., 77 sq., 318 sq., 327 n. 49; cf. 155.
 Dungal of Pavia, his reply to Claudius of Turin, 37.
 Ealdhelm, saint, student at Malmesbury 14; and at Canterbury 19: cf. 326.
 Eberhard of Bethune 118.
 Elmo abbat of Werum 207 n. 8.
 Erigena, origin of the name, 55 n. 2.
 Eugenius II 24.
 Eugenius III 182 sq., 187.
 Filmer, sir Robert, 231 n. 6, 291 n. 13.
 Frankfurt, council of (794), 27 sq.
 Fredegisus, abbat of Tours, his view of inspiration, 46, 66 sq.
 Fulbert bishop of Chartres 88, 113 sq.
 Fulk prior of Deuil 146 n. 11.
 Gall, saint, in Switzerland, 15.
 Geoffrey the Fair count of Anjou 129, 131, 347 sq.
 Geoffrey of Auxerre abbat of Clairvaux 163, 185 sq., 190-193, 199.
 Geoffrey bishop of Chartres 154, 163.
 Gerbert, pope Sylvester II, 88 sqq., 100 sq.; theological work attributed to, 329-335.
 Gilbert de la Porrée bishop of Poitiers 132-135, 179-194, 197-200, 367-372; cf. 120 sq., 206 sq., 210 sq., 325.
 Gottschalk the predestinarian 50-53; cf. 44 n. 27, 53 sq.
 Gottschalk abbat of Saint Éloy 187.
 Greek learning among the Irish 12, 57 sq., 318 sq.; introduced by Hadrian at Canterbury 18 sq.; manuscripts at York 21.
 Gregory I the Great 7 sq.
 Gregory VII, see Hildebrand.
 Gregory IX 249 sq.
 Gregory XI 284 n. 2, 293.
 Gregory of Tours 76.
 Grimbold 313-316.
 Grimoald duke of Benevento 43.
 Guitmund archbishop of Aversa 88.
 Gundobald king of the Burgundians 45.
 Hadrian II 94.
 Hadrian IV 213, 233.
 Hadrian of Canterbury 18 sq.
 Hebrew learning, presumed, among the Irish, 12 and n. 1; manuscripts said to have formed part of the library at York 21 n. 19.
 Heloïssa 146-149, 159 sq., 166.
 Henry II king of England 213 sq., 347 sq.
 Heric of Auxerre 75, 100, 140; cf. 337.
 Heriger abbat of Lobbes 89 and n. 11; cf. 76 n. 24.
 Hilary, saint, his influence on Gilbert de la Porrée 133 n. 30; cf. 193.
 Hildebrand, pope Gregory VII, 226-233; cf. 94 sq., 244, 262, 282.
 Hincmar archbishop of Rheims 53; cf. 44 n. 27.
 Honorius III 77.
 Honorius of Autun, work attributed to, 130, 340-344, 346, 351.
 Hugh of Champfleury bishop of Soissons 186.
 Hugh of Saint Victor 110; cf. 77, 198, 200, 211 sq., 371.
 Ingulf abbat of Croyland, chronicle ascribed to, 316, 322 sqq., 326, 329.
 Innocent II 157 sqq., 166.
 Innocent III 248, 250, 252.
 Irish culture diffused by missionaries 9-18; cf. 74 n. 23, 76 n. 25, 85 sq.: distinguished from the English tradition 18, 22 sq.
 Israel a Scottish bishop 85 sq.
 Italy, schools of, 81-84.
 Ivo bishop of Chartres 114.

- Jews, the, their condition under Lewis the Pious, 46 sqq.
John XXII 253, 265 sq., 280 sq.
John of Cornwall 199 n. 30.
John of Jandun 265; cf. 264 n. 11.
John of Paris 245 n. 17, 261, 264 n. 12.
John of Salisbury 200-225; cf. 161:
his account of the school of Chartres 120-124, 360 sq.; and of the council of Rheims 187-189, 194; cf.
367-370: his political doctrine
233-238.
John the Saxon abbat of Athelney
314 sqq., 321-325, 328 sq.
John the Scot 53-78, 99 sqq., 313-
329; cf. 13 n. 14, 180, 225 n. 21, 311 sqq., 335 sq.: his allegorical treatment of Scripture 46, 62 sq., 66 sq.
John the Scot, saint, bishop of Mecklenburg 327.
Jonas bishop of Orleans 36 sq., 236.
Judith empress of Charles the Bald
47 sq., 74.
Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury
84, 102 sq., 114.
Laon, school of, 111 sq; Abailard at,
143 sqq.
Leidrad archbishop of Lyons 38.
Leo III 251 sq.
Lewis I the Pious 47 sq.
Lewis IV the Bavarian 263, 265 sq., 280 sq.
Lisle, school at, 106.
Livinus, saint, 13 n. 14.
Locke, John, 291 n. 13.
Lotulf of Novara 149, 151.
Lucretius, study of, 118, 219 n. 19, 357.
Luxeuil, abbey of, 15.
Lyons, practice of the wager of battle at, 45.
Mailduf founder of Malmesbury 14.
Malmesbury, abbey of, 14, 19, 56, 319-326.
Manegold of Lutterbach 232; cf.
229 n. 4.
Manicheans 92-97.
Marcionites 92 sq.
Marsiglio of Padua 263-277; cf.
279 sqq., 307.
Martianus Capella 76, 118 sq.
Maximus the Neo-Platonist 58.
Mentz, council of (829), 51.
Michael of Cesena 280.
Milan, church of, 94 sq.
Montforte, heresy at, 95 sq.
Nicea, second council of (787), 27 sq., 33 and n. 15.
Nicholas I 58, 319; cf. 56 n. 3.
Nicholas II 233.
Northbert, saint, 157.
Northumbrians in the Irish schools 12.
Notker Balbulus, saint, 123 sq.
Ockham, William, 264, 275-281;
cf. 304, 307.
Odo bishop of Cambray 106.
Orleans, heresy at, 96 sqq.
Otto I the Great 85, 87.
Otto III 90.
Otto of Freising, his criticism of saint Bernard, 183-186.
Oxford, university of, legends about the, 314, 324, 328; cf. 201 n. 1:
Wycliffe at, 286-289: manuscripts at, 55 n. 2, 131, 135 n. 32, 172, 285 n. 3, 289 n. 10, 312 sq., 329-
335, 340, 350 sq., 370 sqq.
Paraclete, the, oratory, afterwards abbey, of, 155 sq., 159 sq., 166, 196.
Paris, councils of (825), 36; (1147) 186; (1209) 225: schools of, their supposed early origin 56; under William of Champeaux 109 sq.,
124, 138 sq.; under Gilbert de la
Porree 133 sq., 210, 207 n. 7; cf.
202-205, 208 sqq., 264.
Pascasius Radbert 49, 80.
Patrick, saint, 9.
Paulicians 93 sqq.
Pavia, law-school of, 83.
Pelayo, Alvaro, 250.
Peter de la Celle 213, 215 n. 15.
Peter Helias 207.
Peter the Lombard 187.
Peter the Venerable 166.
Philip the Fair, king of France,
248, 257.
Plato, translations of, 172 n. 7; commentary on, by William of Conches 124, 353; his influence on medieval thought 55, 58, 117 sq., 126, 130, 170-175, 295.
Poppo, vision of, 87.
Priscian, commentaries on, 207, 353
n. 77.
Ptolemy of Lucca 240 n. 5.
Pulleyn, Robert, cardinal, 210 sq.

Quidort, John, see John of Paris.

Rabanus Maurus archbishop of Mentz 51, 336.

Raimbert, a nominalist, 106.

Ralph of Laon 111 sq.

Ratherius bishop of Verona 80, 82.

Ratramnus 59 n. 8, 76.

Reichenau, abbey of, 15, 87.

Remigius, saint, of Auxerre, 75, 100.

Rheims, council of (1148), 187-194, 367 sq.

Richard l'Évêque bishop of Avranches 124, 131 sq., 207, 360 sq.

Richard fits Ralph archbishop of Armagh 284 n. 1.

Robert of Melun bishop of Hereford 187, 204 sq.; cf. 110.

Rome, council of (826), 24: see and church of, claims of, 58, 77, 226-231, 246-253, 255 sq., 282 sq.; views held concerning, at different times, 3 sq., 22 sq., 28, 35, 83, 89 n. 12, 189, 233, 235, 239, 241 sq., 246, 253 sqq., 258-262, 272 sqq., 277-280, 284 sq., 289, 302 sqq.: relation of the church towards learning 5-9, 24, 79 sq., 175-179.

Roscelin 98 sq., 103 sq., 321; cf. 141, 152, 337 sq.: his relations with Abailard 137 sq., 150 sqq., 364 sqq.

Saint Denys, abbey of, 57; Abailard at, 148 sq., 155 sq.

Saint Gall, abbey of, 15, 87, 100.

Saint Geneviève, schools of, 139 sq., 160 sqq., 203 sqq., 212.

Saint Victor, abbey of, 100, 211 sq.; cf. 139.

Saracens, their inroads upon Italy, 32.

Scotland, a name including Ireland, 14 n. 15.

Scots, see Irish.

Sens, council of (1140), 163-166.

Simon of Poissy 210 sq.

Soissons, council of (1121), 151-155.

Stephen of Alinerra 191 n. 23.

Sulgen bishop of Saint David's, his studies in Ireland, 14 n. 15.

Sylvester II, see Gerbert.

Terric, see Theodoric.

Tertullian 6.

Theobald archbishop of Canterbury 189, 213 sq.

Theodore of Tarsus archbishop of Canterbury 18.

Theodoric of Chartres 114 sqq., 207, 364 sqq.; cf. 187 n. 20, 371.

Thomas Aquinas, saint, 240-246; cf. 303.

Tournay, school at, 106.

Trionfo, Augustin, 250, 253 sqq.

Vercelli, council of (1050), 76.

Vicenza, heresy at, 80 sq.

Vienna, manuscripts at, 265 n. 13, 290 n. 11, 292.

Vilgard of Ravenna 82.

Vincent of Beauvais 356 sq.

Virgil, commentary on, 118, 170.

Virgil bishop of Salzburg, his doctrine of antipodes, 23.

Vulgarius, Eugenius, 83.

Walafrid Strabo 36, 135 n. 32.

Walter of Mortagne 187 n. 20.

Walter of Saint Victor 199, 349.

Warinus de Liro abbat of Malmesbury 325 sq.

Wearmouth, library of, 19.

Wicelin of Bremen 111.

William of Champeaux 107, 109 sqq., 138 sqq.

William of Conches 122, 124-131, 173, 176 sq., 206 sq., 347 sqq., 359-363: his bibliography 340-359.

William of Hirschau, work attributed to, 130, 338-346, 351.

William of Malmesbury, his account of John the Scot, 316-329; cf. 78.

William of Saint Thierry, his attacks on Abailard 162 sq.; and on William of Conches 129.

Wybald abbat of Corvey 78.

Wybert archdeacon of Milan 95.

Wycliffe, John, 284-307; cf. 244, 249, 275.

York, library of, 21.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON;
20, SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH.

CATALOGUE

OF

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE'S PUBLICATIONS.

us. Agamemnon. Greek Text rel and translated by John F. Davies, 8vo, cloth. 3s.

ed Ameer) Life of Mohammed. A ical Examination of the Life and hings of Mohammed, from a ammedan Standpoint, including pters on Polygamy, Slavery, Mos-Rationalism, Moslem Mysticism,
Crown 8vo, cloth. 9s.

(Professor H.) Table of Aryan
o-European) Languages, showing Classification and Affinities, with us Notes; to which is added, m's Law of the Interchange of e Consonants, with numerous Illusons. A Wall Map for the use of eges and Lecture-rooms. 2nd
ion. Mounted with rollers. 10s.
table of the Aryan Languages, with s and Illustrations. 4to, boards.
7s. 6d.

graphy of an Independent Minister, sters from the. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 4s.

er (Rev. Dr. J.) Glossary of Cornish es, Ancient and Modern, Local, ily, Personal, 20,000 Celtic and Names in use in Cornwall. 8vo, 12s.

us' Epistle, in Greek, from the itic Manuscript of the Bible, with anslation by S. Sharpe. Crown cloth. 2s. 6d.

(A.) Physical Metempiric. By the Alfred Barratt. With a Portrait.
cloth. 10s. 6d.

Barratt (A.) Physical Ethics, or the Science of Action. 8vo, cloth. 12s.

Baur (F. O.) Church History of the First Three Centuries. Translated from the Third German Edition. Edited by Rev. Allan Menzies. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 21s.

— Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ, his Life and Work, his Epistles and Doctrine. A Contribution to a Critical History of Primitive Christianity.
Translated by Rev. A. Menzies. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 21s.

Bayldon (Rev. G.) Icelandic Grammar. An Elementary Grammar of the Old Norse or Icelandic Language. 8vo, cl. 7s. 6d.

Beard (Rev. O.) Lectures on the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge. (Hibbert Lectures, 1883.)
8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.

— Port Royal, a Contribution to the History of Religion and Literature in France. 2 vols. 8vo. 12s.

Bernstein and Kirsch. Syriac Chrestomathy and Lexicon. Chrestomathia Syriaca cum Lexico. 2 vols. in 1.
8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.

Bible, translated by Samuel Sharpe, being a Revision of the Authorized English Version. 5th Edition of the Old Testament, 9th Edition of the New Testament. 8vo, roan. 4s. 6d.

— vide also Testament.

- Bible for Young People. A Critical, Historical, and Moral Handbook to the Old and New Testaments. By Dr. H. Oort and Dr. J. Hooykaas, with the assistance of Dr. Kuenen. Translated from the Dutch by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. 6 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s.
- Bisset (A.) Short History of the English Parliament. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 7s.
- Bleek (F.) Lectures on the Apocalypse. Edited by Dr. S. Davidson. 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Bryce (Rev. Dr.) The Laws of Greek Accentuation simplified. 3rd Edition. 12mo. 6d.
- Channing and Lucy Aikin. Correspondence of William Ellery Channing, D.D., and Lucy Aikin, from 1826 to 1842. Edited by Anna Letitia Le Breton. Crown 8vo, cloth. (Published at 9s.) 4s.
- Cholmondeley (Canon Charles) The Passage of the Four GAP. A New Explanation of Romans ii. 11—16, with its bearing on the Intrinsic and Extrinsic Systems of Justification by Faith, and on the Pauline Views of the Tübingen Critics and others. 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.
- Cobbe (Miss F. Power) The Peak in Darien, and other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and the Body. Crown 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.
- The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures delivered in London and Clifton. 2nd Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- The Hopes of the Human Race, Hereafter and Here. Essays on the Life after Death. With a Preface having special reference to Mr. Mill's Essay on Religion. 2nd Edition. Cr. 8vo. 5s.
- Alone to the Alone. Prayers for Theists, by several Contributors. 3rd Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Cobbe (Miss F. Power) Broken Lights. An Inquiry into the Present Condition and Future Prospects of Religious Faith. 3rd Edition. 5s.
- Dawning Lights. An Inquiry concerning the Secular Results of the New Reformation. 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Darwinism in Morals, and (13) other Essays (Religion in Childhood, Unconscious Cerebration, Dreams, the Devil, Auricular Confession, &c. &c.). 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Crawford (Rev. Dr.) Horæ Hebraicæ. Cr. 8vo, cloth. 4s. 6d.
- Crowfoot (J. B.) Fragmenta Evangelica quæ ex antiqua recens. vers. Syriac. Nov. Test. a Curetono vulg. Græce reddita, &c. 2 Parts; and Observations, 1 Part. 4to. 20s.
- Cureton (Dr. W.) History of the Martyrs in Palestine, by Eusebius, in Syriac. Edited and translated. Royal 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Dante's Inferno. Translated into Greek verse by Mussurus Pasha, D.C.I. 8vo, cloth. 12s.
- Dauids (T. W. Rhys) Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by some Points in the History of Indian Buddhism. (Hibbert Lectures, 1881.) 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Davidson (Rev. Dr.) On a Fresh Revision of the English Old Testament. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- Delitzsch (Dr. F.) The Hebrew Language viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research. By Dr. Fred. Delitzsch, Professor of Assyriology at the University of Leipzig. Crown 8vo. 4s.
- Dipavamsa, the: a Buddhist Historical Record in the Pali Language. Edited, with an English Translation, by Dr. H. Oldenberg. 8vo, cloth. 21s.
- Dunkin (E., F.R.S.) Obituary Notices of Astronomers, Fellows and Associates of the Royal Astronomical Society. 8vo, cloth. 6s. 6d.

of Holy Thoughts: arranged as the Meditations before a First nunion. 2nd Edition, with a ce by Rev. J. Hamilton Thom.
ed with red lines. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

rdt (C.) Denmark in the Early Iron Illustrated by recent Discoveries
e Peat-Mosses of Slesvig. 33
s (giving representations of up-of a thousand objects), Maps, umerous other Illustrations on 4to, cloth. 31s. 6d.

George) An Essay on Assyriology.
George Evans, M.A., Hibbert
v. Published for the Hibbert es. With 4to Tables of Assyrian ptions. 8vo, cloth. 5s.

., M.A.) An Essay on Assyriology. ished for the Hibbert Trustees.)
4to Tables of Assyrian Inscrip-
8vo, cloth. 5s.

1 of Christianity, The. 8vo,
12s.

(Dr. H.) Commentary on the Proof the Old Testament. Trans-by the Rev. J. F. Smith. Comin 5 vols. Vol. I. General In-tion, Joel, Amos, Hosea and rya 9—11. Vol. II. Yesaya,
a and Mikha. Vol. III. Nahûm,
anya, Habaqqûq, Zachârya,
ya. Vol. IV. Hezekiel, Yesaya
xvi. Vol. V. and last, Haggai,
arya, Malaki, Jona, Baruc, l, Appendix and Index. 8vo, 5 vols. Each 10s. 6d.

mentary on the Psalms. Trans-
by the Rev. E. Johnson, M.A.
8vo, cloth. Each 10s. 6d.

mentary on the Book of Job, Translation. Translated from erman by the Rev. J. Frederick 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.

er (Dr. O.) Handbook of Pali; an Elementary Grammar, a omathy, and a Glossary. 8vo, 16s.

Fuerst (Dr. Jul.) Hebrew and Chaldee
Lexicon to the Old Testament. 4th Edition, improved and enlarged. Translated by Rev. Dr. Samuel Davidson.
Royal 8vo, cloth. 21s.

— Kept also half-bound morocco. 26s.

Goldschmidt (H. E.) German Poetry; with the English Versions of the best Translators. Poems of Goethe, Schiller, Freiligrath, Bürger, Heine, Uhland, Körner, &c. &c. Translated by Carlyle, Anster, Blackie, Sir Th. Martin, Shelley, Lord Ellesmere, Lord Lytton, Coleridge, Longfellow, Edgar Bowring,
Garnett, &c. 8vo, cloth. 5s.

Gostwick (J.) and B. Harrison. Outlines of German Literature. Dedicated to Thos. Carlyle. New Edition. 8vo. 10s.

Gotch (Rev. Dr. J. W.) Oodex Cottonianns.
A Supplement to Tischendorf's Fragments in the Monumenta Sacra. Together with a Synopsis of the Codex.
Facsimile. 4to, cloth. 7s. 6d.

Gould (Rev. S. Baring) Lost and Hostile Gospels. An Account of the Toledoth Jesher, two Hebrew Gospels circulating in the Middle Ages, and extant Fragments of the Gospels of the first Three Centuries of Petrine and Pauline Origin. Crown 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.

Hanson (Sir R. D.) The Apostle Paul and the Preaching of Christianity in the Primitive Church. By Sir R. D.
Hanson, Chief Justice of South Australia, Author of "The Jesus of History," &c. 8vo, cloth. (Published at 12s.) 7s. 6d.

Hardy (R. Spence) Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development. Translated from Cingalese MSS. 2nd Edition, with a complete Index and Glossary 8vo, cloth. 21s.

— Eastern [Buddhist] Monachism; an Account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, &c. &c. of the Order of Mendicants founded by Gotama Buddha. 8vo, cloth. 12s.

Hariri. The Assemblies of Al Hariri.
Translated from the Arabic, with an Introduction and Notes. Vol. I. 10s.

- trodition and the first Twenty-six Assemblies. By T. Chenery, Esq. 8vo, cloth. 10s.
- Hausrath. History of the New Testament Times. The Time of Jesus. By Dr. A. Hausrath, Professor of Theology, Heidelberg. Translated by the Revds. C. T. Poynting and P. Quenzer. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 21s.
- Hemans (Chas. I.) Historic and Monumental Rome. A Handbook for the Students of Classical and Christian Antiquities in the Italian Capital. Crown 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- History of Mediæval Christianity and Sacred Art in Italy (A.D. 900—1500). 2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth. 18s.
- Higginson (Rev. E.) Ecce Messias: or, The Hebrew Messianic Hope and the Christian Reality. 8vo, cloth. (Published at 10s. 6d.) 6s.
- Horne (W.) Religious Life and Thought. By William Horne, M.A., Dundee, Examiner in Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews; Author of "Reason and Revelation." Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d.
- Keim's History of Jesus of Nazara. Considered in its connection with the National Life of Israel, and related in detail. Translated from the German by Arthur Ransom. Vol. I. 2nd Edition. Introduction, Survey of Sources, Sacred and Political Groundwork, Religious Groundwork. Vol. II. The Sacred Youth, Self-recognition, Decision. Vol. III. The First Preaching, the Works of Jesus, the Disciples, and Apostolic Mission. Vol. IV. Conflicts and Disillusions, Strengthened Self-confidence, Last Efforts in Galilee, Signs of the approaching Fall, Recognition of the Messiah. Vol. V. The Messianic Progress to Jerusalem, The Entry into Jerusalem, The Decisive Struggle, The Farewell, The Last Supper. Vol. VI. Arrest and Pseudo-Trial, The Death on the Cross, Burial and Resurrection, The Messiah's Place in History. 8vo, cloth. Each 10s. 6d.
- Kuenen (Dr. A.) The Religion of Israel to the Fall of the Jewish State. Translated by A. H. May. 3 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d.
- Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions. (Hibbert Lectures, 1882.) 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Laing and Huxley. Pre-Historic Remains of Caithness. By Samuel Laing, Esq., with Notes on the Human Remains by Th. H. Huxley, F.R.S. 150 Engravings. 8vo, cloth. 9s.
- Lane (E. W.) Arabic-English Lexicon, derived from the best and most copious Eastern Sources. Vols. I. to VI. (to be completed in 8 vols.). Royal 4to. Each 25s.
- Vol. VII. Fascic. I. II. Edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. 4to. Each 6s.
- Latham (Dr. R. G.) Two Dissertations on the Hamlet of Saxo-Grammaticus and of Shakespear. 8vo. 5s.
- Lepsius (O. R.) Standard Alphabet for reducing Unwritten Languages and Foreign Graphic Systems to a Uniform Orthography in European Letters. 2nd Edition. 8vo, cloth. 3s.
- Letters to and from Rome in the Years A.D. 61, 62, and 63. Translated by C. V. S. (by Sir Richard Hanson). Crown 8vo, cloth. 2s. 6d.
- Lindsay (Dr. James, M.A.) The Analytical Interpretation of the System of Divine Government of Moses. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth. 6s.
- Linguistic Notes on some Obscure Prefixes in Greek and Latin. (4 Parts.) Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. 6d.
- Macan (R. W.) The Resurrection of Jesus Christ. An Essay in three Chapters Published for the Hibbert Trustees 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Mackay (R. W.) Sketch of the Rise and Progress of Christianity. 8vo, cloth (Published at 10s. 6d.) 6s.

- Malan (Rev. Dr. S. O.) The Book of Adam and Eve, also called the Conflict of Adam and Eve with Satan. A Book of the early Eastern Church. Translated from the Ethiopic, with Notes from the Kufale, Talmud, Midrashim, and other Eastern works. 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.
- Massey (Gerald) A Book of the Beginnings. Containing an Attempt to recover and reconstitute the lost Origines of the Myths and Mysteries, Types and Symbols, Religion and Language. 2 vols. Imperial 8vo, cloth. 30s.
— The Natural Genesis. 2 vols. Imp. 8vo, cloth. 30s.
- Milinda Panho, the. Being Dialogues between King Milinda and the Buddhist Sage Nagasena. The Pali Text, edited by V. Trenckner. 8vo. 21s.
— vide also Pali Miscellany.
- Mind, a Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy. Nos. 1—32. 1876-83. 8vo, each 3s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.
- Müller (Professor Max) Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by the Religions of India. (Hibbert Lectures, 1878.) 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Nibelungenlied. The Fall of the Nibelungers, otherwise the Book of Kriemhild. An English Translation by W. N. Lettsom. Crown 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.
- Nicolson (Rev. W. M.) Classical Revision of the Greek New Testament. Tested and applied on uniform Principles, with suggested Alterations of the English Version. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d.
- Norris (E.) Assyrian Dictionary. Intended to further the Study of the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Assyria and Babylonia. Vols. I. to III. 4to, cloth. Each 28s.
- O'Curry (Eng.) Lectures on the Social Life, Manners and Civilization of the People of Ancient Erin. Edited, with an Introduction, by Dr. W. K. Sullivan. Numerous Wood Engravings of Arms, Ornaments, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. 42s.
- Oldenberg (Prof. H.) Buddha, his Life, his Doctrine, and his Order. Translated by Dr. Wm. Hoey, B.C.S. 8vo. 18s.
— vide Vinaya Pitakam.
- Pali Miscellany, by V. Trenckner. Part I. The Introductory Part of the Milinda Panho, with an English Translation and Notes. 8vo. 4s.
- Panhellenic Annual for 1880. Edited by S. Parasyrakes. With 21 Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, gilt edges. 5s.
- Peill (Rev. George) The Threefold Basis of Universal Restitution. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s.
- Pennethorne (John) The Geometry and Optics of Ancient Architecture, illustrated by Examples from Thebes, Athens and Rome. Folio, with 56 Plates, some in colours. Half morocco. £7. 7s.
- Pfleiderer (O.) Paulinism: a Contribution to the History of Primitive Christian Theology. Translated by E. Peters. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s.
— Philosophy of Religion. Translated by the Rev. Alexander Stewart, of Dundee. (In 3 vols.) Vol. I. 8vo.
- Platonis Philebus, with Introduction, Notes and Appendix; together with a Critical Letter on the "Laws" of Plato, and a Chapter of Palæographical Remarks, by the Rev. Dr. Chas. Badham, D.D. 2nd Edition, enlarged. 8vo, cloth. 4s.
— Euthydemus et Laches, with Critical Notes and "Epistola critica" to the Senate of the Leyden University, by the Rev. C. Badham, D.D. 8vo, cl. 4s.
— Convivium (Symposium), with Critical Notes and an Epistola (de Platonis Legibus) to Dr. Thompson, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, by the Rev. C. Badham, D.D. 8vo, cloth. 4s.

- Protestant Commentary, A Short, on the Books of the New Testament: with general and special Introductions. Edited by Professors P. W. Schmidt and F. von Holzendorff. Translated from the Third German Edition, by the Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A. (In 3 vols.) Vol. I. Matthew to Acts. Vol. II. Romans to Galatians. 8vo, cloth. Each 10s. 6d.
- Quarry (Rev. J.) Genesis and its Authorship. Two Dissertations. 2nd Edition, with Notice of Animadversions of the Bishop of Natal. 8vo. 12s.
- Reliquiæ Aquitanicæ; being Contributions to the Archæology and Palæontology of Périgord and the adjoining Provinces of Southern France. By Lartet and Christy. Edited by T. Rupert Jones, F.R.S., F.G.S. 87 Plates, 3 Maps, and 130 Wood Engravings. Royal 4to, cloth. £3. 3s.
- Renan (E.) On the Influence of the Institutions, Thought and Culture of Rome on Christianity and the Development of the Catholic Church. (Hibbert Lectures, 1880.) 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Renouf (P. le Page) Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as illustrated by the Religion of Ancient Egypt. (Hibbert Lectures, 1879.) 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Reville (Rev. Dr. A.) The Song of Songs, commonly called the Song of Solomon, or the Canticle. Crown 8vo, cl. 1s. 6d.
- Sadi. The Gulistan (Rose-Garden) of Shaik Sadi of Shiraz. A new Edition of the Persian Text, with a Vocabulary, by F. Johnson. Square royal 8vo, cloth. 15s.
- Samuelson (James) Views of the Deity, Traditional and Scientific: a Contribution to the Study of Theological Science. Crown 8vo, cloth. 4s. 6d.
- Schmidt (A.) Shakespeare Lexicon. A complete Dictionary of all the English Words, Phrases, and Constructions in the Works of the Poet. 2 vols. Imp. 8vo, 30s.; cloth, 34s.
- Schrader (Prof. E.) The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament. Translated by the Rev. O. C. Whitehouse. (In the press.)
- Schurman (J. G.) Kantian Ethics and the Ethics of Evolution. A Critical Study. (Published by the Hibbert Trustees.) 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Seth (A.) The Development from Kant to Hegel, with Chapters on the Philosophy of Religion. (Published by the Hibbert Trustees.) 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Sharpe (Samuel) History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature. With an Appendix on the Hebrew Chronology. 4th Edition, 487 pp. 8vo, cl. 7s. 6d.
- Hebrew Inscriptions from the Valleys between Egypt and Mount Sinai, in their Original Characters, with Translations and an Alphabet. 2 Parts. 20 Plates. 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.
- vide also Bible, and Testament.
- Smith (Arthur M.) A System of Subjective Political Economy. 8vo cloth. 5s.
- Political Economy Examined and Explained. Containing an Explication of that which the Public understand by the words, Wealth, Value, and Capital. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d.
- Smith (Rev. J. F.) Studies in Religion under German Masters. Essays on Herder, Goethe, Lessing, Frank, and Lang. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- vide Ewald's Prophets and Job.
- Sophocles. The Greek Text critically revised, with the aid of MSS., newly collated and explained. By Rev. F. H. M. Blaydes. I. Philoctetes. II. Trachiniæ. III. Electra. IV. Ajax. 8vo, cloth. Each 6s.
- Spencer (Herbert) First Principles. 5th Thousand, with an Appendix. 8vo. 16s.
- The Principles of Biology. 2 vols. 8vo. 34s.
- The Principles of Psychology. 4th Thousand. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s.
- The Principles of Sociology. Vol. I. 21s.

Catalogue.

- Spencer (Herbert) Ceremonial Institutions. (Principles of Sociology, Vol. II. Part 1.) 8vo. 7s.
- Political Institutions. (Principles of Sociology, Vol. II. Part 2.) 8vo. 12s.
- The Data of Ethics. Being the First Portion of the Principles of Ethics. 8vo, cloth. 8s.
- The Study of Sociology. Library Edition (being the 9th), with a Postscript. 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d.
- Education: Intellectual, Moral, and Physical. 8vo, cloth. 6s.
- The same, cheaper Edition, 4th Thousand. 12mo, cloth. 2s. 6d.
- Classification of the Sciences: to which are added, Reasons for dissenting from the Philosophy of M. Comte. 2nd Edition. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- Essays: Scientific, Political, and Speculative. (Being the First and Second Series re-arranged, and containing an additional Essay.) 2 vols. 4th Thousand. 8vo, cloth. 16s.
- Essays. (Third Series.) Including the Classification of the Sciences. 3rd Edition. 8vo. 8s.
- Descriptive Sociology, or Groups of Sociological Facts. Compiled and abstracted by Professor D. Duncan, of Madras, Dr. Richard Sheppig, and James Collier. Folio, boards. No. 1. English, 18s. No. 2. Ancient American Races, 16s. No. 3. Lowest Races, Negritto Races, Polynesians, 18s. No. 4. African Races, 16s. No. 5. Asiatic Races, 18s. No. 6. American Races, 18s. No. 7. Hebrews and Phœnicians, 21s. No. 8. The French Civilization, 30s.
- Spinoza. Four Essays by Professors Land, Van Vloten, and Kuno Fischer, and by E. Renan. Edited by Professor Knight, of St. Andrews. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s.
- Stephens (George) Old Northern Runic Monuments of Scandinavia and England, now first collected and deciphered. Numerous Engravings on Wood and 15 Plates. Vols. I. and II. Folio. Each 50s.
- Vol. III. (In the Press.)
- Macbeth, Earl Siward and Dundee a Contribution to Scottish History from the Rune-Finds of Scandinavia. Plates. 4to. 2s.
- Thunor the Thunderer, carved on Scandinavian Font about the year 1000. 4to. 6s.
- Stokes (Whitley) Old Irish Glossaries: Cormac's Glossary. O'Davoran's Glossary. A Glossary to the Calendar of Oingus the Culdee. Edited, with an Introduction and Index. 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6c.
- Middle-Breton Hours. Edited, with a Translation and Glossary. 8vo boards. 6s.
- The Creation of the World. Mystery in Ancient Cornish. Edited with Translations and Notes. 8vo, cloth. 6s.
- Strauss (Dr. D. F.) Life of Jesus for the People. The Authorized English Edition. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 24s.
- Sullivan (W. K.) Celtic Studies, from the German of Dr. Hermann Ebel, with an Introduction on the Roots, Stem and Derivatives, and on Case-ending of Nouns in the Indo-European Languages. 8vo, cloth. 10s.
- Taine (H.) English Positivism. A Study of John Stuart Mill. Translated by T. D. Haye. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s.
- Taylor (Rev. John James) An Attempt to ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel, especially in its relation to the first Three. 2nd Edition. 8vo, cl. 5s.
- Testament, The New. Translated by S. Sharpe, Author of "The History of Egypt," &c. 14th Thousand. Fcap 8vo, cloth. 1s. 6d.
- Thoughts (365) for Every Day in the Year Selected from the Writings of Spiritually-minded Persons. By the Author of "Visiting my Relations." Printed with red lines. Crown 8vo, cl. 2s. 6.

Tien (Rev. A.) The Levant Interpreter: a Polyglot Dialogue-book, in English, Turkish, Modern Greek, and Italian. Crown 8vo. 5s.

Turpie (Dr. D. McC.) The Old Testament in the New. The Quotations from the Old Testament in the New classified according to their Agreement with or Variation from the Original: the various Readings and Versions of the Passages, Critical Notes. Royal 8vo, cloth. 12s.

— Manual of the Chaldee Language: containing Grammar of the Biblical Chaldee and of the Targums, a Chrestomathy, Selections from the Targums, with a Vocabulary. Square 8vo, cl. 7s.

Vinaya Pitakam: one of the principal Buddhist Holy Scriptures. Edited in Pali by Dr. H. Oldenberg. In 5 vols. 8vo. Vol. I. The Mahāvagga. Vol. II. The Cullavagga. Vol. III. The Suttavibhanga, I. (Pārājika, Samghādisesa, Aniyata Nissaggiya). Vol. IV. The Suttavibhanga, II. (Mahavibhanga, Bhikkunivibhanga). Vol. V. The Parivara, &c. 8vo. Each 21s.

Williams (Rev. Dr. Bowland) The Hebrew Prophets, during the Assyrian and Babylonian Empires. Translated afresh from the Original, with regard to the Anglican Version, with Illustrations for English Readers. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 22s. 6d.

— Psalms and Litanies, Counsels and Collects, for Devout Persons. Edited by his Widow. Fcap. 4to, cloth extra. 12s. 6d.

— Broadchalke Sermon - Essays on Nature, Mediation, Atonement, Absolution, &c. Crown 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d.

Wright (G. H. B.) The Book of Job. A new critically revised Translation, with Essays on Scansion, Date, &c. By G. H. Bateson Wright, M.A., Queen's Coll., Oxford, Head Master of the Government Central School, Hong Kong. 8vo, cloth. 6s.

Zeller (Dr. E.) The Contents and Origin of the Acts of the Apostles critically investigated. Preceded by Dr. Fr. Overbeck's Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles from De Wette's Handbook. Translated by Joseph Dare. 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. 21s.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE have published the following Catalogues of their Stock.

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin Classics.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. Including Philosophy and Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature, History, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature.
- * MAP CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
5. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
- * ITALIAN CATALOGUE.
- * SPANISH CATALOGUE.

6. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages and Literature.
7. MEDICAL CATALOGUE. Medicine, Surgery, &c.
8. NATURAL HISTORY CATALOGUE. Zoology, Botany, Geology, Palæontology.
9. NATURAL SCIENCE CATALOGUE. Mathematics, Astronomy, Physics, Mechanics, Chemistry, &c.
10. ART CATALOGUE. Architecture, Painting, Sculpture and Engraving. Books illustrated by Artists.
11. SCHOOL CATALOGUE. Elementary Books, Maps, &c.

This book is under no circumstances to be taken from the Building

JAN 11 1928

[illegible]

